By Old, Sea-Washed Beyrout.

It Lies in the Lap of the Mediterranean, and is as Venerable as History Itself—Probably of Phœnician Origin—The Scene of Great Gospel Activity—Its People and Their Progress.

AMONG those cities of antiquity that have preserved their identity to the present day, there are few that are better known to travelers in the East than Beyrout. It is identified by many historians with the Berothah of the Phœnicians, and has for many centuries been an important seaport. It lies on the Mediterranean coast, nearly sixty miles northwest of Damascus, and is situated on rising ground, on a tinian's reign it was one of the few places in the empire at which law was permitted to be taught, and its colleges were held in the highest estimation. Nearly 1,400 years ago, an earthquake inflicted general damage on the city, but it was again rebuilt. Baldwin I., the Crusader, captured it from the Moslems after a determined siege, in 1111, but it again fell into the hands of the Turks in the seventeenth century, after having many European structures, including churches and schools. Indeed, in some parts, it has the appearance of a European or American city.

Beyrout has long been a renowned centre of missionary work, which has been prosecuted vigorously for fully forty years by the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions, and for nearly half of that time by the American Presbyterian Board. Large promontory known as Jebeler-Rosesh. The Beyrout of to-day (which is shown in the colored illustration on this page) probably bears but slight resemblance to the ancient city which was once under the supremacy of Sidon, one of the most famous of Oriental seaports in the time of the Jewish kings. About 140 years before Christ, it was levelled by Trypho, the Syrian usurper, being restored nearly two hundred years afterward by the elder Agrippa, after the Roman invasion, and raised to the dignity of a Roman colony. In the third century Beyrout was a noted school of law, and in Jus-been the leading city of the Druses during the long interval. In 1772, it was bombarded by a Russian fleet, and in 1840 almost destroyed by an English naval force.

Since that time, Beyrout has languished, and has never attempted to regain its old influence and prosperity, although it is still the most important of Syrian seaports and a point of general interest for the tourist. Its streets are wide and its buildings lofty and spacious, while the suburbs are beautifully interspersed with orchards and gardens. Like most Eastern cities, it abounds in mosques and bazaars, although there are numbers of native youth of both sexes have been educated and sent throughout Syria as preachers and teachers of the Gospel. Every year brings an extension of the mission work in the city and suburbs, among a population as varied in character as that of any city in the world, and which includes Druses, Mohammedans, Maronites, Greeks, Arabs and other races. Girls' and boys' schools, ragged schools, orphanages, hospitals and many excellent charities and philanthropies have been established and are in successful operation, supported by various Christian denominations.

on the Text, II. Corinthians 8: 9: . . .

HAT all the worlds which on a cold winter's night make the heavens one great glitter are without inhabitants is an absurdity. Scientists tell us that many of these worlds are too hot or too cold or too rarefied of atmosphere for residence. But, if not fit for human abode, they may be fit for beings different from and superior to ourselves. We are told that the world of Jupiter is changing and becoming fit for creatures like the human race, and that Mars would do for the human family with a little change in the structure of our respiratory organs. But that there is a great world swung somewhere, vast beyond imagination, and that it is the headquarters of the universe, and the metropolis of immensity, and has a population in numbers vast beyond all statistics, and appointments of splendor beyond the capacity of canvas, or poem, or angel to describe, is as certain as the Bible is authentic. Perhaps some of the astronomers with their big telescopes have already caught a glimpse of it, not knowing what it is. We spell it with six letters and pronounce it heaven.

That is where Prince Jesus lived nineteen centuries ago. He was the King's Son. It was the old homestead of eternity, and all its castles were as old as God. Not a frost had ever chilled the air. Not a tear had ever rolled down the cheek of one of its inhabitants. There had never been a headache, or a sideache, or a heartache. There had not been a funeral in the memory of the oldest inhabitant. All the people there were in a state of eternal adolescence. What floral and pomonic richness! Gardens of perpetual bloom and orchards in unending fruitage. Had some spirit from another world entered and asked, What is sin? What is bereavement? What is sorrow? What is death? the brightest of the intelligences would have failed to give definition, though to study the question there was silence in heaven for half an hour.

Already enthroned was the Heavenly Prince side by side with the Father. What a circle of dominion! What multitudes of admirers! What unending round of glories! All the towers chimed the prince's praises. Of all the inhabitants, from the centre of the city, on over the hills and clear down to the beach against which the ocean of immensity rolls its billows, the prince was the acknowledged favorite. No wonder my text says that "he was rich." Set all the diamonds of the earth in one sceptre, build all the palaces of the earth in one Alhambra, gather all the pearls of the sea in one diadem, put all the values of the earth in one coin, the aggregate could not express his affluence. Yes, St. Paul was right. To describe his celestial surroundings, the Bible uses all colors, gathering them in rainbow over the throne and setting them as agate in the temple window, and hoisting twelve of them into a wall, from striped jasper at the base to transparent amethyst in the capstone, while between are green of emerald, and snow of pearl, and blue of sapphire, and yellow of topaz, grey of chrysoprase, and flame of jacinth. All the loveliness of landscape in foliage, and river, and rail, and all enchantment aquamarine, the sea of glass mingled with fire as when the sun sinks in the Mediter-

"Ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor."

anean. All the thrill of music, instrumental and vocal, harps, trumpets, doxologies. There stood the prince, surrounded by those who had under their wings the velocity of millions of miles in a second, himself rich in love, rich in adoration, rich in power, rich in worship, rich in holiness, rich in "all the fulness of the Godhead bodily."

But one day there was a big disaster in a department of God's universe. A race fallen! A world in ruins! Our planet the scene of catastrophe! A globe swinging out into darkness, with mountains, and seas, and islands, an awful centrifugal of sin seeming to overpower the beautiful centripetal of righteousness, and from it a groan reached heaven. Such a sound had never been heard there. Plenty of sweet sounds, but never an outcry of distress or an echo of agony. At that one groan the prince rose from all the blissful circumjacence, and started for the outer gate and descended into the night of this world. Out of what a bright harbor into what a rough sea! "Ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor."

Was there ever a contrast so overpowering as that between the noonday of Christ's celestial departure and the midnight of his earthly arrival? Sure enough, the angels were out that night in the sky, and an especial meteor acted as escort, but all that was from other worlds, and not from this world. The earth made no demonstration of welcome. If one of the great princes of this world steps out at a depot, cheers resound, and the bands play, and the flags wave. But for the arrival of this missionary Prince of the skies not a torch flared, not a trumpet blew, not a plume fluttered. All the music and the pomp were overhead. Our world opened for him nothing better than a barn-door. To know how poor he was, ask the camel drivers, ask the shepherds, ask Mary, ask the three wise men of the East, who afterward came to Bethlehem. To know how poor he was, examine all the records of real estate in all that Oriental country, and see what vineyard, or what field he owned. Not one. Of what mortgage was he the mortgagee? Of what tenement was he the landlord? Of what lease was he the lessee? Who ever paid him rent? Not owning the boat on which he sailed, or the beast on which he rode, or the pillow on which he slept. He had so little estate that in order to pay his tax he had to perform a miracle, putting the amount of the assessment in a fish's mouth and having it hauled ashore. And after his death the world rushed in to take an inventory of his goods, and the entire aggregate was the garments he had worn, sleeping in them by night and traveling in them by day, bearing on them the dust of the highway and the saturation of the sea. St. Paul in my text hit the mark when he said of the missionary Prince, "For your sakes he became poor."

The world could have treated him better if it had chosen. It had all the means for making his earthly condition comfortable. Only a few years before when Pompey, the general, arrived in Brindisi he was greeted with arches and a costly column which celebrated the twelve million people whom he had killed or conquered, and he was allowed to wear his triumphal robe in the Senate. The world had applause for imperial butchers, but buffet-ing for the Prince of Peace. Plenty of golden chalices for the favored to drink out of, but our Prince must put his lips to the bucket of the well by the roadside after he had begged for a drink. Poor? Born in another man's barn, and eating at another man's table, and cruising the lake in another man's fishing-smack, and buried in another man's tomb. Four inspired authors wrote his biography, and innumerable lives of Christ have been published, but he composed his autobiography in a most compressed way. He said, "I have trodden the wine press alone."

Poor in the estimation of nearly all the prosperous classes. They called him Sabbath-breaker, wine-bibber, traitor, blasphemer, and ransacked the dictionary of opprobrium from cover to cover to express their detestation. I can think now of only two well-to-do men who espoused his cause, Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea. His friends for the most part were people who, in that climate where ophthalmia or inflammation of the eyeball sweeps ever and anon as a scourge, had become blind, sick people who were anxious to get well, and troubled people in whose family there was some one dead or dying. If he had a purse at all it was empty, or we would have heard what the soldiers did with the contents. Poor? The pigeon in the dove-cote, the rabbit in its burrow, the silk-worm in its cocoon, the bee in its hive is better provided for, better off, better sheltered. Aye, the brute creation has a home on earth, which Christ had not. A poet says:

If on windy days the raven
Gambol like a dancing skiff,
Not the less he loves his haven
On the bosom of the cliff.
If almost with eagle pinion
O'er the Alps the chamois roam,
Yet he has some small dominion
Which no doubt he calls his home.

But the Crown Prince of all heavenly dominion has less than the raven, less than the chamois, for he was homeless. Aye, in the history of the universe there is no other instance of such coming down. Down until there was no other harassment to suffer, poor until there was no other pauperism to torture. Billions of dollars spent in wars to destroy men, who will furnish the statistics of the value of that precious blood that was shed to save us? "Ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor."

Only those who study this text in two places can fully realize its power, the Holy Land of Asia Minor and the holy land of heaven. I wish that some day you might go to the Holy Land and take a drink out of Jacob's well, and take a sail on Galilee, and read the Sermon on the Mount while standing on Olivet, and see the wilderness where Christ was tempted, and be some afternoon on Calvary at about three o'clock—the hour at which closed the crucifixion—and sit under the sycamores and by the side of brooks, and think and dream and pray about the poverty of him who came our souls to save. But you may be denied that, and so here, in another continent and in another hemisphere, and in scenes as different as possible, we recount as well we may how poor was our Heavenly Prince. But in the other holy land above we may all study the riches that he left behind when he started for earthly expedition. Come, let us bargain to meet each other on the bank of the river just where it rolls from under the throne, or at the outside gate. Jesus got the contrast by exchanging that world for this; we will get it by exchanging this world for that. There and then you will understand more of the wonders of the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, "though he was rich, yet for your sakes became poor."

Yes, grace, free grace, sovereign grace, omnipotent grace! Among the thousands of words in the language there is no more queenly word. It means free and unmerited kindness. My text has no monopoly of the word. One hundred and twenty-nine times does the Bible eulogize grace. It is a door swung wide open to let in the pardon of God all the millions who choose to enter it.

John Newton sang of it when he wrote:
Amazing grace, how sweet, the sound,
That saved a wretch like I, etc.

Philip Doddridge put it into all hymnology when he wrote:

Grace, 'tis a charming sound,
Harmonious to the ear;
Heaven with the echo shall resound
And all the earth shall bear.

One of John Bunyan's great books is titled, "Grace Abounding." "For the grace that I am saved" has been on the lips of hundreds of dying Christians. The boy Sammy was right when being examined for admission into church membership he was asked: "Whose work was your salvation?" and he answered: "Part mine and part God's." Then the examiner asked: "What part did you do, Sammy?" and the answer was: "I opposed God all I could, and he did the rest!" Oh the height of it, the depth of it, the length of it, the breadth of it, the grace of God! Mr. Fletcher having written a pamphlet that pleased the king, the king ordered to compensate him, and Fletcher answered: "There is only one thing I want, and that is more grace." Yes, my blood-bought hearers, grace to live by and grace to die by. Grace that saved the publican that saved Lydia, that saved the dying thief that saved the jailer, that saved not that the riches of that grace will not be fully understood until heaven breaks in upon the soul. And there are here hundreds homesick for heaven, some because you have so many bereavements, some because you have so many temptations, some because you have so many ailments. For the sick, very homesick, for the father and the mother, and the music that you hear now is the song of free grace, the music that you want to hear when you die is free grace, and forever before the throne of God you will sing of the "grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, though he was rich, yet for your sakes became poor!"

Yes, yes; for your sakes! It was not on a pleasure excursion that he came, for it was all pain. It was not on an astronomical exploration, for he knew this world as well before he alighted as afterward. It was not because he was compelled to come, for he volunteered. It was not because it was easy, for he knew that it would be thorn, and spike, and hunger, and thirst, and vociferation of angry mobs. "For your sakes!" To wipe away your tears, to forgive your wrongdoing, to companionship your loneliness, to soothe your sorrows, to sit with you by the new-made grave, to bind up your wounds in the ugly battle with the world and bring you home at last, kindling up the mists that fall or your dying vision with the sunlight of a glorious morn. "For your sakes!" For our sakes! We who deserve for our sins to be expatriated into a world as much poorer than this, than this earth is poorer than heaven. For our sakes! But what a frightful coming down to take us gloriously up.

Oh, the personality of this religion! Not an abstraction, not an arch under which we walk to behold elaborate masonry, nor an ice castle like that which the Empress Elizabeth of Russia, over a hundred years ago, ordered to be constructed. Winter with its trowel of crystals cementing the huge blocks that had been quarried from the frozen rivers of the North, but our Father's house with the wide heart crackling a hearty welcome. A religion of warmth and inspiration, and light, and cheer: something we can take into our hearts, and homes, and business, recreations, and joys, and sorrows. Not an unmanageable gift, like the galley presented to Ptolemy, which required four thousand men to row, and its draught of water was so great that it could not come near the shore but something you can run up any stream of annoyance, however shallow. Enrichment now, enrichment forever.

greatly aided their cause. Late advices from Havana, received in Washington, represent the revolutionary movement as still active and hopeful, though the military leaders are depressed in consequence of the serious illness of Gen. Maximo Gomez, the leader of the revolution. Gomez is an old man, and the death of Maceo seems to have weighed heavily upon him. He is said to be physically unable to perform the duties of a military leader, and it is even asserted that he has signified his willingness to end the war, provided this can be arranged through the friendly offices of the United States government. Just what his conditions are, or how reliable the rumor of his intentions may be, as a whole, cannot now be known. Should the statement concerning Gomez's attitude prove to be well-founded, the present Cuban campaign, like all its predecessors, may soon terminate. Spain giving assurance of such concessions as would be most likely to restore tranquility and confidence on the island. The whole story, however, is scouted by the Cuban Junta emphatic manner in the present controversy. He declares that Spain means to continue the war in Cuba until her sovereignty is acknowledged; and that, while his country is ready to grant local self-government to the island, it will only do so after the insurrection has been completely subdued. Spain, he adds, does not court war with the United States, but will, nevertheless, resist with all the forces at her command any aggressive movement on the part of our government. Spain will not yield an inch to force or threats, nor will she consent to be directed in her domestic affairs by any other government. She seeks peace, but will not shrink from war in any matter touching her honor. If we force war upon her, he says, Spain will defend herself; but she will not be the aggressor. Premier Castillo then proceeds to discuss the possibility of a Cuban republic, which he declares would be a very grave menace to the peace of America, and a worse experiment in its results than Hayti. At no time has our Administration believed it probable that the Cuban difficulty

SENATOR J. D. CAMERON.

OUR controversy with Spain over Cuba continues to engross the attention of the nation, as no other topic has done since the memorable trouble with Chili several years ago. Now, as then, there is a very ardent and enthusiastic element among our people, who favor the adoption of a policy by our government that would have the result of bringing matters quickly to a focus. On the other hand, the more conservative, in and out of Congress, advise making haste slowly, hoping that the difficulty may be adjusted satisfactorily, without involving a diplomatic rupture that might lead to serious results. In last week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the story was told of the passage of Senator Cameron's now famous Cuban recognition resolution by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and also of Secretary of State Olney's opinion dissenting from that resolution, claiming for the President the exclusive right to act in such a contingency, and intimating that a Presidential veto awaited any resolution of recognition, if passed by Congress. This contention has been widely and warmly discussed, in and out of Congress, and both sides have many advocates. Its effect has been to delay Congressional action. There is much disappointment among Cuban sympathizers with the prospect of American intervention being postponed, as the recognition of Cuba at the present time, they believe, would have late, and as the wealthy people of the country have furnished the necessary funds to continue the war in Cuba, Gen. Weyler will no doubt continue to receive reinforcements with due regularity. With two costly campaigns already under way, Spain would seemingly risk a third than abate one jot of her claim of supremacy in the interest of humanity and justice. Her prompt rejection of the friendly offer by our government to aid in bringing about peace in Cuba on the basis of a concession of home rule on the island, shows how bitter and uncompromising is the Spanish attitude toward the unfortunate "Gem of the Antilles."

Our photographic illustrations on this page are of special and timely interest. Senator Cameron and Secretary Olney represent the opposite views as to the policy of our government on this great question. The Queen Regent and her son, King Alfonso XIII, are probably less important factors in the present case in a political sense, than Premier Canovas del Castillo, who has given expression to the Spanish policy. Madrid, the capital is at this moment alive with war excitement, which is not likely to abate for some time to come. Spain is passing through an ordeal of great severity, in which only the wisest statesmanship and the most enlightened and humane policy can effect real service to the ancient nation, once great and influential, but now occupying only a secondary place in the European sisterhood of monarchical states.

in America, whose members declare that it is unfounded and that the revolution is still progressing with every prospect of ultimate success. They point to the general enthusiasm that prevails in Cuban circles and to the fact that reinforcements of men and arms continue to reach the island. One of the largest of these filibustering expeditions was safely landed in Cuba last week, after an exciting brush with a Spanish launch and a gun-boat.

Possibly another cause of Gomez's discouragement may be found in the dissensions that are said to exist among the Cuban leaders themselves. These allegations of dissension, the Spanish government is making the most of. The Havana authorities have published broadcast the statement that Maceo's death was attributable to the quarrels and non-support of the Cuban Council, and that he practically threw his life away in desperation and sorrow. This new version of Maceo's fate, however, originated with Dr. Zertucha, the man who is believed to have basely betrayed Maceo to the Spanish commander, Gen. Ahumada, and who is interested in exculpating himself, if possible.

Canovas del Castillo, the Spanish Premier, and who may be regarded as representing the sentiment of the Spanish people, as well as the policy of his government, has placed himself on record in an would embroil us seriously with Spain. One result of the dispute, however, is that steps have been taken to put our Navy in the best possible condition—not with any view to hostile contingencies but on general principles. The War College has for three years past been busy upon the plans for the defense of the coast, and a scheme for the arming of a number of auxiliary cruisers, to supplement the regular naval vessels, is proposed. In all this preparation there is no undue haste or excitement. Much of it was begun before the present trouble arose. In Spain, however, every nerve is being strained to get the Navy on a war footing, and the dockyards are working with quadrupled forces. It is announced by cable that the Spanish Minister of the Navy has even supplied maps of the American coast defenses to the officers of the fleet, although this is probably an exaggeration.

The youthful King Alfonso, being still a mere lad, is under the tutelage of his mother, the Queen-Regent, and can hardly be supposed to comprehend the grave questions that are just now troubling the statesmen of his nation. The Queen is said to be intensely patriotic in regard to the necessity of making any sacrifice to save Cuba to the Spanish crown. Her ministers and advisers, without exception, agree that Castilian honor demands that the integrity of the nation be kept invioity, was formerly the Central Methodist Church. In its great days, under the old regime, the saintly Alfred Cookman was among its pastors. Here General Grant worshipped, and here also Bishop J. P. Newman's eloquent ministry crowded the building to the doors. But its down-town location on Seventh avenue and Fourteenth street, had latterly hindered its growth. The older members died, the younger ones moved away, and the huge population all around it knew little of its history and cared less. In the meantime, the Forward Movement had begun in the Metropolitan Meetings in the old Scotch Presbyterian Church on 14th street. A few godly laymen with ample means determined at all hazards to reach the people. They succeeded, and as the members gathered around them, they demanded a church home and pastoral care. When the trustees of this time-honored building threw open its doors to the leaders of the Metropolitan Meetings, they gladly took possession, and the present magnificent structure was the result of the re-modeling of the old edifice. A new name, expressive of its larger purpose, was given it, and the reopening services drew together the leaders of the Protestant denominations of New York and other cities.

The Parisian life of the great metropolis, full as it is of deadly indifference to spiritual affairs; its cosmopolitan character, its agnostic materialism, its foul abysses of vice, lewdness and corruption, make New York the problem of problems for evangelical Christianity. It is the chosen battle-ground of the contending forces of good and evil. Nor can it be won for Christ without a grasp upon the full, rich qualities of Christ's Gospel, qualities which strike into the roots of individual life, and branch out into every sphere of its many-sided and opulent civilization. Yet the fight has been measurably won in this church. One year and eight months ago the actual membership of both the Central Church and Metropolitan Hall was not more than 200. To-day the membership of the Temple is about 800. Rev. S. P. Cadman, the pastor, has received 614 members in that space of time, and 340 of these have been admitted to church-fellowship, this since last April. There have been 656 reported conversions, and many of these of extremely interesting character. Much of the accomplished good is due to house-to-house visitations. Although four churches have been torn down in that district during the past two years, the audiences at the Temple have grown from week to week. The attendance for the year ending December 1st, 1896, was 284,925, an average of 5,450 per week. The Lord's Day audiences at night find the Temple too small, and it is one of the two largest Protestant congregations in the city. These figures do not include the attendance at the Reading-rooms, the Chautauqua Circles, the Sewing School, receptions, class-meetings, etc. They do convey a measure all their own as to the effectiveness of Christianity in reaching the people when fearlessly trusted and applied. These figures are strictly within limits. The people have been reached pre-eminently by the preaching of the Gospel. All roads lead to Calvary; all words point to Christ. However much the moods and methods vary, the end is one and never changes: it is to bring back men to the living and present Saviour, waiting to receive them.

Beginning on Lord's Day morning at 9 o'clock, the services go on nightly, forty-two a week, and each evening has some special feature, made attractive by wise variations. The Sunday audiences are large, that in the evening being one of the largest in the city. Stress is laid upon the preaching. Dr. Cadman firmly believes in the supreme function of the

Monday evenings are devoted to councils, when a theme is announced beforehand, and the audience takes a hand in this discussion. How much of latent ability is undeveloped in our churches none may great congregation of joy, praise, prayer, and Bible readings. Open-air work is followed the entire summer. Thursday evening's service on the steps of the building often draws hundreds who are invited within to the evangelistic meeting. Conversions are frequent at all these services. The Friday evening questions have aroused considerable curiosity. Editors, professional men, the clergy, as far away as Memphis, Tenn., and Chicago, have made inquiries about this service. The audience will number on specially interesting evenings as many as 700. Largely men. They write their questions, which are read from the platform, and answered by the pastor. The Saturday night concerts have reached more people than any other service save that of Sunday night and the programme is a most attractive one.

The one ideal that is constantly kept before the Temple officers is holiness to God, the root of love, fatherhood, sacrifice, redemption, without which a church is a corpse, and not the less dead because dressed in the garments of life. Members are received every Sunday. Acceptance of pardon in Christ Jesus is continually pressed home, and the conversions are faithfully followed by systematic visitation. A thousand visits a week can be arranged for in case of special effort.

One of the features of the church's work is a vested choir of one hundred voices under the leadership of Mr. C. J. Evans. Every Lord's Day morning they render a full choral service and many are drawn to the Temple by the excellent music. On Sunday afternoon a Pleasant Hour Bible Class, under Mr. P. W. Radcliffe, has an average attendance of about 500. There are, besides, many organizations that deserve mention, and which furnish opportunity for every member to be active in some line of Christian work.

Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, the pastor, is a young man of little more than 30 years of age. He was born near the city of Birmingham, England, and was educated in Richmond College, London, where he graduated at the head of his class. In 1891 he was appointed to Millbrook, N. Y., where he began, in addition to his ministry, an extensive literary career. He is in constant demand as a lecturer, and his lectures on "Lincoln" and "Life in London" have delighted large audiences at Chautauqua. His career, as a preacher has been still greater. Two years at Central Church, Yonkers, N. Y., were so successful that he was called to lead the Forward Movement in Metropolitan Temple. He has the love of all the membership and they admire him for his character as a man as well as for his excellent work. Rev. W. W. Alexander, his Senior assistant graduated at Wesleyan University in 1890. He spent several years as a teacher, took special work in Union Theological Seminary and after one year in a regular pastorate was appointed to the Temple. Rev. J. Lewis Hartsock, his junior assistant, graduated at Johns Hopkins in 1891 and at the Yale Divinity School in 1894. He was appointed to the Temple in 1895.

"The Isle that is Called Patmos."*

An Interesting Description of a Visit to the Scene of St. John's Apocalyptic Vision.

By Rev. W. E. Geil.

SHAPED like a crescent, the white spotted island of Patmos naturally divides into three parts, which are united by narrow strips of sand. The length is eleven miles, the width varies from forty furlongs to a few hundred feet. Marvelously serrated, it offers four excellent harbors, the principal one being Sakla on the Asiatic side sheltered from the east winds by Khelia and Lipso, fantastically shaped islands of the Icarian Sea.

Quite recently small Greek steamers have begun to ply between Smyrna and the Sporades touching at Patmos. It was on one of these I went by way of the port of Ephesus, and arising early in the morning, I hastened on deck and saw what seemed a mountain reaching from the eastern shore to the western coast of an island and the summit appeared to be covered with snow. "What land, helmsman?" I shouted to the wheel-house, "Patmos, sir," he answered. When the eastern light grew brighter I saw on the summit a huge structure towering above the others like a mediaeval castle and white houses clustered around it. 'Twas the Mount and Monastery of Saint John, and Phora, the city of Patmos. Halfway between the city and the wharf stood the Monastery of the Apocalypse, built over the cave or grotto where St. John, tradition says, wrote the Gospel and the Revelation. I afterward visited it and saw the place where St. John pillowed his head, the little cavity where he put his hand when kneeling down to pray, facing a cross which he had cut in the living rock. I also saw the three crevices in the roof of the cave which were made when the earthquake shock rocked the island of the Ægean and the words "I am Alpha and Omega" were spoken, or as another tradition says, when John had been ten days without food suddenly a voice said: "Write, in the beginning was the Word."

And the singular legend was told me as one pointed out the two holes through which the apostle put the string which he fastened to his thumbs to keep himself awake when he prayed. I landed at La Skala, the business centre of the famous isle. From there to Phora a rough and steep paved road extends. It was constructed by a wealthy monk early in the present century. The population of the island is about 4000 men, of whom 150 live near the fortress. The monastery of St. John, was begun by St. Christodoulos in 1688 A.D. and stands where stood the temple of Diana. The people from first to last I found very kind and while much in their religious life and teachings is certainly not Biblical yet it made me think of Brown-body belongs to the Greek Church except the twenty Turks who represent the Sublime Porte. The highest mountain—and the island is naught but mountains and glens, a most barren, weird and fantastic landscape—is crowned with the monastery of St. Elias, which affords a beautiful view from the roof. In the great Monastery of St. John is a valuable library of some 240 books and manuscripts. I saw Gospels that were written in the fifth century, with the names of the Trinity in gold. This building has also a wealth with great difficulty and the stench from their decaying bodies was so great as to necessitate the carting of them beyond the city wall where they were buried in long trenches. When rain is wanted on Patmos all the one hundred relics are brought forth, including the top of the skull of St. Stephen, and a procession is formed, the monks bearing the sacred relics and all chanting praises and prayer. Then it always rains, I was informed. It is not well to be frivolous concerning the bones of the dead; but I could but think that if the sky had any feelings at all, it would surely weep at such a sight. There are forty-four monks and forty nuns on the island. The people make pottery, knit hose, and fish for sponges. There is one piano on Patmos, but nobody can play it. When I inquired how many horses there were, a young Patmonite said "five and one-half," meaning five horses and one colt. A monopoly has closed down the salt works and I saw a fast steamer belonging to the Tobacco Monopoly of Turkey in the port of La Skala.

The name of the Hermit of Patmos is Theostestos, said by the natives to mean "Built by God." When asked if he would receive me, he said, "I prefer to meet but few of human kind, but I cannot be so inhospitable as to refuse to welcome one who has come from such a distant land." I was admitted by a large, partially rotten wooden door, in the outer wall of what was once the school to which the flower and chivalry of Greece and the Archipelago had gathered. For more than a century the robed priests had here taught the youth of the Hellenes, but since freedom from the Turk had been obtained by Greece, schools have multiplied, and the College of Patmos, once so nine. 'Tis here he lives. There was a strong smell of fish, which I soon discovered came from a drying octopus spread out on a board, nailed near the roof. He made us welcome at once by bringing a very clean bowl filled with water and a glass of syrup. We each tasted the sweet with the same spoon and drank from the same bowl of water. After this he talked freely. He was a boy in Thyatira, and has lived on Patmos fifteen years. When he came he located in a dreary and barren spot far away from any one, but many came to see his beautiful garden, and hence to enjoy solitude he fled to the ruin. The priests of the monastery did not wish him to come, but he told them if they did not let him live in the old college, "he would go and live with Kynops, the devil." This last argument prevailed. He knew the legend of Kynops. The legend is that Kynops was a magician, who was on the island when St. John arrived, and as the Evangelist was making enough converts to disturb the priests of Apollo, they conspired to get rid of St. John. To this end, they employed Kynops. So Kynops gathered a great crowd together on the shore, and said to John, "Now, I will do a wonder you cannot do," whereupon Kynops said to a man, "Have you a son?" "No," answered the addressed, "I had a son, but he was assassinated." Then the magician jumped into the sea and brought up a ghost-like thing which looked like the son, and also likenesses of the two men who had murdered him. When the people saw this, they asked John to do as much, but he said, "My business is not to raise the dead, but to help save the living." St. John knelt down and prayed to God. He arose, and placing his arms in the form of a cross, commanded the magician in the name of that emblem, to depart into the sea and never return. He was drowned soon after, the legend says.

"Theostestos, kindly tell me why you live the life of an Anchorite?" I asked. He seemed pleased, and answered, "I've given myself to God. 'I am going to die, and will have to appear before God, and now I am thinking about what answer I will give him.' On the window sill there was a human skull with a cross on the forehead, in blackest black. Pointing to the skull, I asked about it. He said, 'I keep it to look at; I knew the man well,' he continued: 'have had many a talk with him. He told me how, when he was ready to go to Constantinople, a friend asked him to purchase and bring back to the island a mirror. He made the journey, and upon his return he told the man to get his friends together, that he would the next evening bring it. They were all assembled, and in expectant mood, when the traveler stepped in, and taking a skull from under his coat, said: 'Here is the mirror. Only a little while and you will look like this.'"

After I had passed out of the old ruin, the recluse stood for a moment at the open door, and I waved my hand and said, "Hermit of Patmos, farewell!"

and praises chanted with prayers to drive the grape worms off the wine-island. The skull prevailed and the worms left. The people gave the monks $1,500 for the visit. Fifteen years ago the grasshoppers visited Smyrna in large numbers and destruction was greater than a vast hostile army. "I was then the skull of St. Thomas was taken in a large silver goblet by a company of monks to Smyrna. After prayer and praise, the skull was held aloft. He was dressed in a loose garment, dark colored, reaching from the shoulders to the feet, and drawn in round the waist with a piece of rope. It was old and shiny. He wears no other clothes. His hair and whiskers were long and iron gray, but he had a kindly and intelligent face. There was a flash in his eyes at times which seemed to tell of other days when he, too, was in the thick of this world's enthusiasm. About Saying "I Thank You,"

And About Letters.

It is not worth while for all of us to consider our ways in the matter of thanking people for kindness done to us? The proper thing when a gift has been received is to acknowledge it, if possible, in one form by letter sent to the one whose kind thought took you into its purpose and bought or made for you something which was intended to be a useful possession or pleasant souvenir. In writing such a letter of thanks, it is well worth while to be explicit, telling why the gift pleased you, and what place you mean to have it among the things you value. Never put off such a letter for several days or weeks; the grace of gratitude is twice as beautiful if exercised at once.

Sometimes one cannot send a letter because the present or token is given by a member of the family or by an intimate friend who is out and in the house constantly, so that a letter would be too formal. In this case we must never stint the expression of our thanks, but tell the thoughtful giver in plain words, cordially and lovingly, how much we are indebted to the kindness shown. It is a good rule in correspondence of all kinds to send our answer very promptly, because a letter is in some sense a part of the friend who writes it. Nothing else except a printed book is so living as a letter.

When some one sets down and writes to me telling me her wishes or experiences, or giving me little bits of chat about home and friends, I feel a warm glow at my heart, and it is just as if in the lingering twilight she had slipped her hand in mine, and, sitting sociably down beside my fire, had told me delightful things she wanted me to know. If I do, our exchange of letters will be very much like a conversation carried on through a telephone, only it will be much better and less formal, because we can say more with our pens than we can say with our lips, at least through a telephone, which has its limitations, though it is a great contrivance!

We should always take pains with our letters, and especially with letters to members of our own family who are away from home. If the mother and daughter, or the mother and son, are separated by many miles, if new interests are coming in to divide them and new associations are being formed, the home feeling can still be kept warm and strong by means of frequent letters. The letters should not be homilies.

I once knew an instance in which a son away from home was absolutely antagonized and made more homesick than before by the constant sermons which were sent to him by his well-meaning parents. He said one day, "The dear old people never tell me a thing about the neighbors or about the farm or about themselves; they simply preach, and preach, and preach, so that I do not take any pleasure in their letters." This was a great mistake. After all, what we do in this world, and what we say, are of much less importance than what we are, and we do not have to preach at our dear ones if our lives are always sweet testimonies to right living and right thinking.

I would like to say just here that it is a good rule for all one's life never to write a letter in an angry spirit. If you are out of temper, wait till the feeling of irritation has entirely passed, and you are again calm and tranquil. Sleep over anything which troubles you; sometimes to-morrow morning throws a very different light on a situation from that which it appeared to have yesterday. A wise man once said to his sister, when she brought him a letter which she had written to one who had offender her—a letter full of hot resentment and righteous indignation: "This is a very good letter, my dear, and does credit to your power of expression, but shall I tell you what to do with it? Put it right in the fire and burn it up: it will make a bright blaze, and that will be the best way to treat it. If you send this letter you will make an enemy where you may yet have a friend. Always leave a loop-hole for penitence and pardon."

I am moved to write this way about letters at the end of the year, because it is a good plan before the year quite finishes its work to sit down and get out of debt to all your correspondents. Is there anybody far away from home or near to whom you have been owing a letter? Is there somebody who, for some reason or other, is in trouble or ill; some friend in a hospital whose days move slowly on; some boy away from home; some young girl whose life is shadowed by sorrow, or who is fighting temptation? This is a good time now before the year wanes to send to such a one a letter full of Christmas joy, and of merry wishes and happy thoughts for another year. It may be in your power to slip a pretty card or a little gift of some sort into your letter. If so, that will make it all the better worth sending, but the letter itself is a very personal and intimate gift—the best you can send in many cases.

Some one asked me not long ago to give directions about the appropriate sort of stationery to use in private correspondence. There is no special rule, but plain white paper, unruled, with envelopes to match, is always in fashion and in good taste. We should avoid, so far as possible, all sorts of fancy papers. Tinted papers, and papers with little pictures in the corner, such as flowers, brownies, fern leaves, and so forth, may do very nicely for little children who like such things in their stationery, but grown people prefer simplicity.

Of one thing we cannot be too careful, and that is always to sign our letters in full and very plainly. Many people write a letter legibly all the way to the very end, and then their signatures taper off into scrawls which no mortal can read. A fine, strong, clear signature is a splendid thing to have. You know the way we sign our name is indicative of our character, and shows whether we are straightforward, honorable, scrupulous people, or whether we are careless, untidy and apt to leave our affairs at loose ends. In a business letter one must most carefully guard two or three things: one is the giving of one's post office address in full, state, town and county. Another is adding the date with care and pains, and the last, as I may be pardoned for saying again, is the giving one's name in letters so clear that no mistake can be made about them.

The Brewer's Dog.

While walking one evening along one of the streets of the North End, Boston, says a writer, we saw two men supporting a third, who appeared to be unable to walk. "What is the matter?" we inquired. "Why," was the reply, "the poor man has been badly bitten by the brewer's dog." "Indeed," we said, feeling somewhat concerned at the disaster. "Yes, sir, and he is not the first by a good many that has been thus bitten." "Why do they not kill the dog?" "Ah, sir, he ought to have been made away with long ago, but the law won't allow it. It is strong drink, sir—that's the brewer's dog."

Neglected Children.

There are, Alas! too Many, of Whom the More Fortunate World Takes Little Heed.

ALTHOUGH there are, in our large cities and towns, many excellent benevolent and philanthropic institutions for the benefit of unfortunate children, there are thousands of little ones living at places remote from all such advantages, and who cannot hope to share in them. To the youthful inmates of isolated homes in distant states, there may come at times a dream of something better and nobler than the life that surrounds them, but many grow up in ignorance and poverty, and so pass on to maturity and old age.

Many times has THE CHRISTIAN HERALD directed the attention of its readers to the pitiful fate of those neglected children. Letters from earnest, Christian men in North Carolina, Missouri, Arkansas, New Mexico, Arizona, Kansas, Nebraska and South Dakota have disclosed the fact that in the outlying districts of those states there is work enough for scores of missionaries. It is in such fields as we have described that the veterans of the American Sunday School Union and our own missionary, Rev. Geo. W. Sharp, have won their best triumphs.

In a letter from Mr. Rogers, a South Dakota missionary, we are afforded a realistic picture of social and moral conditions in some rural district of that State. He writes:

"The Pocket" is a tract of land almost entirely surrounded by the Missouri River. Here I found a very ignorant and needy people; only a few families, but almost entirely cut off from all school and church privileges. The children were growing up in ignorance and poverty. I found one girl, sixteen years old, unable to read or write, and one family of six children, none of whom had ever been to school. The father had taught his children to read. A Sunday School was organized, and held in a private house, as there was no school building in the place. I have visited this school often, and was always greatly pleased to find the children so eagerly interested. It was a school that would remind one of the days of Robert Raikes. The children were taught to read as well as to learn their Sunday School lesson.

Another section, full of poor, neglected children, is known as the "Bottom," near Vermillion, S. D. The first Sunday School was held in an old creamery building, and it could hardly be kept up, but now there are about forty children who attend.

THE COMFORTER.

WHEN my reason shall fail, and my life shall decay,
When the scenes of this world shall vanish and flee,
When sunshine and shower alike pass away,
Then, Light of the blessed, shine sweetly on me.
When heedless of earth and of all that surround me,
For pardon and mercy I'll call upon thee;
When death with its fetters forever has bound me,
Then, Jesus, sweet Jesus, be Jesus to me.
When, weeping, my friends shall with fervor implore thee,
My strength, my protector, my succor to be;
When, helpless and lonely, I tremble before thee,
Then, Fountain of mercy, have mercy on me.
Then, dear Lord, the dark chain of my miseries sever;
Then, Rest of the weary one, call me to thee;
Then, Crown of the just, be my portion forever;
Then, merciful Jesus, have mercy on me.
WALLACE YOUNG

A Deluge of Letters.

THAT'S just what it amounts to. If any reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should visit our offices in the Bible House and see the avalanche of mail matter we are daily, ay hourly, receiving, he would possibly think a Presidential election was in full progress. But these letters contain something pleasanter even than votes—al tho' they are votes, in a sense, for they record the unhesitating and spontaneous vote of thousands upon thousands of bright men and women all over the land, that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Premium Library No. 2, is the finest, most interesting, most valuable and handsomest set of ten volumes ever put together in one case and sent out broadcast by any Publisher on the globe.

We have read these letters until their words of eulogy seemed stamped on our brain. They left nothing unsaid; they simply exhausted the dictionary and left us not a syllable to say ourselves, without incurring the charge of direct plagiarism. We realized that Premium Library No. 2, had indeed filled "a long felt want," as the popular saying goes. It had come like snowflakes at Christmas and was as universally and jubilantly welcomed. Everybody likes it, reads it, and commends it. If we were to print all the glowing letters we have received about it (and which, as we write, are now stacked high around us in great piles, thousands deep), we could fill many successive issues of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and crowd out everything else. Here is a sample of many hundreds of them:

24 Milton St., Readville, Mass.
CHRISTIAN HERALD PUBLISHER:—You may well call your Library Premium "marvelous"—it far exceeds my expectations. I am simply delighted, and although I sent for the Library for the purpose of having the books for Christmas gifts, they don't help me out one bit, for I want them all myself. I fear your ministers will look very grave at this, but perhaps I may give some of them away another year. I must read them all first. Please accept many thanks.
L. C. DOWNING.

Another writer is also puzzled about it. Here is his letter:

"Prairieside Park," Raritan, Ill.
PUBLISHER, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:—The excellent and beautiful CHRISTIAN HERALD Library, No. 2, for 1897, is just received. How you can give these ten useful and entertaining books, and also the best of all religious weekly papers for a year for $3, is a marvel, and past comprehension.
ANDREW HAGEMAN.

This friend sums up her pleasure in a single graphic phrase. She writes:

Wellsville, Mo.
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York.—I am delighted with the PREMIUM LIBRARY. I have shown it to a number of friends and they think it a "perfect gem."
LYDIA KUHNE.

But we shall not yield to the temptation to print more of the letters, although their perusal has afforded us much gratification.

For the benefit of those who have not yet got a set of Premium Library No. 2 (and we trust that no CHRISTIAN HERALD reader will neglect this opportunity of acquiring something that will give the greatest pleasure and satisfaction to every recipient), we will state that this Library is totally different from that sent out last year. We are striving every season to improve upon the preceding season, and this year we have reached the top notch in our Library Premium. It consists of ten elegantly bound volumes, averaging 300 pages each and the whole enclosed in a handsome case. As can be seen by a glance at the list, they cover a wide variety of topics and are sure to suit the reader, no matter in what direction his taste may run. The titles are:

1. The Wedding Ring.
By REV. T. DEWITT TALMAGE, D.D.
2. The Secret of a Happy Home.
By MARION HARLAND.
3. Notable 19th Century Events.
By JOHN CLARK RIDPATH, D.D.
4. How to Succeed.
By ORISON S. MARDEN, M.D.
5. Holiday Stories for the Young.
By MARGARET E. SANGSTER.
6. The Land we Live In.
By HENRY MANN.
7. Winter Evening Tales.
By AMELIA E. BARR.
8. Recitations for the Social Circle.
By JAMES CLARENCE HARVEY.
9. The Fairy-Land of Science.
By ARABELLA B. BUCKLEY.
10. Many Thoughts of Many Minds.
By LOUIS KLOPSCH, PH.D.

We should be sorry, after the opportunity has gone, to learn that any of our friends had altogether missed the chance of securing a set. It has already met with such warm praises and given so much satisfaction on all sides, that we feel justified in urging all who can possibly do so, to send at once for the Library. For $3 you can have the ten volumes, case included, sent to you by express, prepaid, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD mailed to you weekly for one year. Address your order, without delay, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York City.

Neither Cold Nor Hot.

AFTER we have been taking a long walk on a summer's day, or been on a hunting chase, a draught of cold water exhilarates. On the other hand, after standing or walking in the cold air and being chilled, hot water, mingled with some beverage, brings life and comfort to the whole body; but tepid water, neither hot nor cold, is nauseating. Now, Christ says that a Church of that temperate acts on him as an emetic: "I will spew thee out of my mouth."

The Church that is red-hot with religious emotion, praying, singing, working, Christ having taken full possession of the membership, must be to God satisfactory. On the other hand, a frozen Church may have its uses. The minister reads elegant essays, and improves the session or the vestry in rhetorical compositions. The music is artistic and improves the ear of the people, so that they can better appreciate concert and opera. The position of such a Church is profitable to the book-binder who furnishes the covers to the liturgy, and the dry-goods merchant who supplies the silks, and the clothiers who furnish the broadcloth. Such a Church is good for the business world, makes trade lively, and increases the demand for fineries of all sorts; for a luxurious religion demands furs and coats, and gaiters to match.

Christ says he gets along with a Church, cold or hot. But an unmitigated nuisance to God and man is a half-and-half Church, with piety tepid. The pulpit in such a Church makes more of orthodoxy than it does of Christ. It is immense on definitions. It treats of justification and sanctification as though they were two corpses to be dissected. Its sermons all have a black morocco cover, which some affectionate sister gave the pastor to wrap his discourses in, lest it get matted in the dust of the pulpit. Its gestures are methodical, as though the man were ever conscious that they had been decreed from all eternity, and he was afraid of interfering with the decree by his own free agency. No strong meat, but only flour and water—mostly water.

The church prayer-meeting is attended only by a few gray heads, who have been in the habit of going there for twenty years, not because they expect any arousing time or rapturous experiences, but because they feel only a few will be there, and they ought to go. The minister is so-so. The membership sound. The number good. If, standing in a city of a hundred thousand people, there are five or ten conversions a year, everything is thought to be "encouraging." But Christ says that such a church is an emetic. "Because thou art neither cold nor hot, I will spew thee out of my mouth."

Better warm up or freeze over. Better set the kettle outside in the atmosphere at zero, or put it on the altar of God and stir up the coals into a blaze. If we do not, God will remove us. Christian men are not always taken to heaven as a reward, but sometimes to get them out of the way on earth. They go to join the tenth-rate saints in glory; for if such persons think they will stand with Paul and Harlan Page, and Charlotte Elizabeth, they are much mistaken. When God takes them up, the church here is better off. We mourn slightly to have them go, because we have got used to having them around, and at the funeral the minister says all the good things about the man that can possibly be thought of, because we want to make the funeral as respectable as possible. We never feel so much tempted to misrepresent as when an inconsistent and useless Christian has died, and we want, in our final remarks, to make a good case out for the poor fellow. Still it is an advantage to have such a man get out of the way. He is opposed to all new enterprises. He puts back everything he tries to help. His digestion of religious things is impaired, and his circulation is so poor that no amount of friction can arouse him to spiritual activity.

A Forward Movement.

IT is high time that we stop skirmishing and bring on a general engagement. I want to live to see the Armageddon, all the Armies of heaven and hell battle array, for I know our Conqueror on the White Horse will gain the victory. When Moses, with his army, was trying to conquer the Ethiopians, profane history says it was expected that he would go by a roundabout way and come by the banks of the river, as other armies had done, because the straight route was infested with snakes, and no army and no man had dared go across that serpent-infested region; but Moses surprised them. He sent his men out to gather up ibises. The ibis is a bird celebrated for serpent-slaying. These ibises were gathered into crates and into baskets, and they were carried at the head of the army of Moses, and coming up to the serpent-infested region, the crates were opened and the ibises flew forth, and the way was cleared and the army of Moses marched right on, and came so unexpectedly on the Ethiopians that they fled in wild dismay. O, army of righteousness! You are not to march in a roundabout way, but go straight forward, depending on winged influences to clear the way. Hosts of the living God, march on? The world moves and it moves in the right direction. Our cities will be redeemed. All nations will yet salute the flag of Prince Emmanuel.

Work Done.

WHY should we ever be disheartened about this world, when we remember that out of the sixty centuries of its existence the devil for fifty-nine had it mostly his own way? Within the present century all the Missionary Societies born, all the Bible Societies born, all the Tract Societies born, all the Seamen's Friends Societies born. Do you expect a fragment of the nineteenth century to undo the work of the preceding fifty-nine centuries? Instead of being dismayed that so little is done, be glad that so much has been accomplished, and that a fragment of the nineteenth century has staggered the kingdom of darkness which was being built during fifty-nine centuries. By old-fashioned "Rule of Three" figure out how soon, at that rate, the whole world will be ransomed. Stand out of our way, with your soporifics, and give us a few drops of double-distilled exhilaration. Let pastors, reformers, and Christian workers pitch all their tents toward the sun-rising.

A Timely Word to Subscribers.

THIS being the first issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for 1897, we republish for the information of our Subscribers, the following explanation of the system by which the management of this journal is governed in dealing with unrenowned subscriptions. This explanation appeared only in a limited portion of last week's edition, and we now repeat it in order that it may reach the hands of every CHRISTIAN HERALD subscriber:

A subscriber in Harlem, N. Y., writes as follows: My CHRISTIAN HERALD for this week has not yet come to hand. I presume you have unceremoniously cut me off. Do you think it just right to treat a subscriber of twelve years' standing in that manner?

No subscriber is ever "unceremoniously" cut off from our list. We invariably send, a month previous to the renewal date, an expiry notice, politely informing each subscriber of the approaching expiration of his subscription, and respectfully inviting a continuance. This notice is sent in a separate envelope, and is accompanied by a prospectus, a premium announcement, a subscription blank, and an addressed return envelope. In addition, every copy served to a subscriber bears a tab with his name address and the exact date when, unless renewed, the subscription will cease. When these various reminders fail to enlist the attention of the subscriber, we feel justified in concluding that he does not wish the paper continued, and it is then, and not till then, that his name is taken off the list.

The law permits a publisher to continue the service of the paper until a written order discontinuing it is sent, and even then the subscriber cannot stop it until every copy received has been paid for, and many publications avail themselves of this extraordinary privilege, but THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has consistently refused to place its friends under involuntary tribute by sending the paper after their subscription has expired, thus compelling them to pay for what they have not ordered.

We believe that as a rule, our subscribers would much rather that we govern ourselves strictly in accordance with their written orders than exercise discretionary powers at their expense.

Many subscribers who order THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent to relatives or friends, have expressed the greatest satisfaction with this system. They feel perfectly safe that when the term paid for has expired, the paper will be stopped, and hence they do not incur the risk of having eventually a bill presented for several years of service never contemplated at the time of placing the order.

* * *

Now, as regards the discriminating in favor of old subscribers, however well intentioned or kindly disposed we may be, the size of our subscription list renders such favors absolutely impracticable. If the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD were to undertake to familiarize himself with 500 different names daily, he could not in a single year cover his list of nearly 200,000 subscribers, a list so large that it precludes the possibility of detailed information in regard to individual subscribers. A business of such gigantic proportions cannot be handled otherwise than according to certain well-defined, thoroughly understood and systematically enforced rules, ensuring uniform attention and fair treatment to one and all, with prejudice or favor. Any other course must result in hopeless chaos.

No subscriber has ever yet appealed in vain to have a reasonable extension of time for the renewal of his subscription, during which the service has been continued without interruption, but to generally extend this favor without so much as a postal card requesting it, would involve us in the expenditure of tens of thousands of dollars annually, and eventually land our subscription list in interminable confusion.

* * *

Let every subscriber give heed to the admonition conveyed by the expiry notice, and promptly renew his subscription, and we can assure him that he will never have the slightest cause to complain of a system which is the result of many years of careful study, and best calculated to give the greatest satisfaction to the greatest number, without any snares or pitfalls to entrap the unwary and confiding subscriber.

BRIEF NOTES.

Subscribers should be sure to read carefully the notice in the adjoining column relating to renewals.

Mr. Carrington, the Agent of the American Bible Society in Siam, reports that during a recent tour of the suburbs of Bangkok he sold in eight days over a thousand Bible portions.

Those who contemplate renewing subscriptions for missionaries in Turkey, will do well to remember that there is a possibility of their good intentions miscarrying through the interference of the Sultan's press censors, who have seen fit to stop the delivery of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in several places in the Ottoman realm. This is because the Christians of America made it the medium of their charitable gifts to the persecuted Armenians. Letters from several friends in Turkey inform us that they get THE CHRISTIAN HERALD only at intervals; others have not received it for many months.

Major Whittle and Mr. and Mrs. Stebbins have had wonderful meetings in Edinburgh. Even the afternoon meetings were thronged. Over eight hundred persons attended the Bible readings. The evangelists spent a week in each city-district.

A statement by some Roman Catholic dignitary that the Italian prisoners in Abyssinia were released through the appeal of the Pope, is negated by King Menelik himself, who says that they were released on the queen's birthday as a compliment to the King of Italy.

While portions of the Bible have been translated into nearly four hundred languages and dialects, the whole Bible has been published in one hundred and seven. Of these 40 are in Europe, 41 in Asia, 13 in Africa, 10 in Australasia and Oceania, and 3 in North America.

Evangelist Grant C. Tullar's services in the Old Leonard St. Church in Brooklyn Eastern District were productive of the best results. Several Methodist ministers assisted in the services, and are holding special meetings for the converts who have joined their churches.

The Chicago liquor dealers are threatening, says the Advance, of that city, to take vengeance upon the anti-saloonists by closing all saloons for four months, and thus depriving the city of $1,000,000 revenue. And the victims are only too eager for the vengeance to begin.

A remarkable gift to the cause of education, probably the largest ever made by one individual to the cause, is reported from Europe. It is announced that Alfred Nobel, the Swedish engineer who died recently at San Remo, Italy, left the whole of his fortune of ten million dollars to the University of Stockholm.

Rev. S. A. King, of Kingston, Ont., writes us that there has been a gracious outpouring of the Spirit in that town. Evangelist E. Ryerson Hermon, held a series of services there which were very largely attended. The whole Western part of the town was deeply stirred, and there were some wonderful conversions.

The religious and philanthropic societies of New York have arranged to hold monthly conferences on charitable work, under the auspices of the Charity Organization Society, in the assembly hall of the United Charities building. The first was held on Dec. 15, when about fifty benevolent institutions were represented.

A proposal is under the consideration of the British prison authorities for the solution of the prison problem of competition in labor. The making of mats and other articles has been complained of because of injuring the business of manufacturers who have to pay the wages of honest workmen. It is now proposed to have the prisons lighted with electricity, the motive power to be furnished by a mill to be turned by men who have been sentenced to imprisonment with hard labor.

An article in the French Journal Revue des Revues states that the conversions of Jews to Christianity are increasing at an unprecedented rate. In the city of Berlin alone 711 Jewish families have joined Protestant denominations within three years. In Great Britain during ten years two hundred Jewish rabbis have embraced Christianity. The same writer states that many Jewish rabbis now openly preach Christian doctrine in their synagogues.

The Services in Cooper Union, New York, are being continued this week by Dr. A. C. Dixon, and other ministers take part in them. Mr. Ira Sankey has charge of the musical exercises. Next week they will be in charge of Mr. J. H. Burke, who assisted Mr. Sankey while Mr. Moody was conducting the services, and who formerly accompanied Evangelist John McNeill in his round-the-world tour. The meetings begin at noon, and are intended to be a rallying-point for Christian workers, who, it is hoped, will labor in the evening in their own churches.

A pathetic story of medical Missions comes to a contemporary from China. A military graduate who was successfully treated for cataract at the Mission Hospital at Hankow was seized on his return home by forty-eight blind men who begged to be taken to the foreign doctor. A rope was fastened to each, and thus a strange procession headed by the cured man and the others following in single file each man holding the rope of the man ahead of him, walked two hundred and fifty miles to the hospital. All of them were treated and listened to the Gospel. One is known to have been converted and others are inquiring.

The Kansas city Star states that a community of fifty young men and women who have consecrated their lives to God, have rented a house in that city, and have given their lives to mission work. They have given up business and in some instances lucrative positions, and are depending entirely on God for all their supplies. Hitherto they have received sufficient food for their daily needs, and sufficient money for the rent. Every member is expected to share in the daily work of the house and to preach and teach in the city. Two of the number have left the community to go out as missionaries to Ecuador. When they sailed from New York they had only $1.40 left after paying their passage. The community is not anxious about them, believing that God will take care of them.

EUROPEAN expectation is aroused as to important events, of which news may soon come from Constantinople. It is generally believed that M. Nelidoff, the Russian ambassador at the Sultan's Court, has returned there from St. Petersburg, charged with a difficult and delicate commission. As the Sultan has chosen to put his trust in Russia, the other great Powers of Europe have apparently agreed to intrust Russia with the task of reforming him. Current reports in Paris, Berlin, Vienna and London concur in stating that M. Nelidoff is to demand certain specific reforms in Armenia, including the appointment of Christian governors in certain districts and other guarantees of good faith which shall dispel fear of a repetition of the massacres. In the event of the Sultan refusing to yield or being dilatory in instituting the reforms, it is expected that the combined fleets of the Powers will at once proceed to Constantinople, and that Armenia will be occupied by Russia. How easily the latter change could be effected will be seen by a glance at the map. Since the Russians swarmed over the Caucasus, capturing the renowned prophet warrior Schamy, and taking Tiflis and subsequently Kars and the whole trans-Caucasian plain, the way to Armenia is open to them. Following her usual custom, Russia maintains on the Armenian frontier a force of Cossacks, which could in case of need be poured into Armenia without the delay of a week. The picturesque location of one of these Cossack stations is shown in the picture on this page. Here the Cossack is in his ideal condition. He likes the duty of patrolling a frontier, and he has no lack of that kind of employment, for Russia has six thousand miles of frontier stretching from Poland in the West across Northern Asia to the Sea of Okhotsk in the extreme East. Everywhere the Cossack is the living rampart, the eye, ear and hand of the Empire keeping watch over its outposts and ready at a word to extend the dominions of the Czar. Since the Cossacks were reduced to submission near the close of the sixteenth century, they have borne the brunt of the military service of the empire. Hardy, fond of adventure, and accustomed to warfare with Asiatic tribes, they lived and were happy under hardships which would have broken down regular cavalry. Their relation to the government has never been the same as other citizens, and to this day they have never been thoroughly assimilated. They own their horses and supply all their accoutrements except the rifle, which with ammunition the Czar supplies. Though the government insists on appointing their chief officers and governors, the Cossack communities elect all their minor officials and manage their own affairs. To a large extent they have paid their dues to the Government in military service and up to a recent date, if not at the present time, that contribution is all that the Cossacks rendered as evidence of their Russian nationality. In time of peace, every male Cossack is required to serve from his eighteenth to his twentieth year. He then gets a year of rest and is afterwards liable to serve for fifteen years on any part of the frontier to which he may be ordered. Commonly he does not serve more than half that time, but if there is war, he finds his term of service indefinitely extended. It was formerly the custom for rich Cossacks to escape service by providing a substitute, but some fifty years ago, that privilege was abolished, and now every male Cossack between the ages of eighteen and forty, holds himself at the Czar's orders and is ready if an emergency rises, to take his place in the field. Their loyalty, their readiness to leave their homes and bear hardships in the service of their sovereign are qualities which the Christian might well emulate in his service to his Heavenly King. He, too, is expected to render personal service and it is his privilege and glory to extend his Master's dominions and to bring new subjects under his sway.

Suffer hardships with me as a good soldier of Jesus Christ. No soldier on service entangles himself in the affairs of this life: that he may please him who has enrolled him as a soldier. (11. Tim. 2: 3, 4, R.V.)

A Girl Leader of Highwaymen.

One of the most astonishing criminal discoveries is reported from Minneapolis, Minn. It appears that highway robberies in that city have increased in numbers of late, and some of them have been very daring, and have involved the loss of large sums of money. A short time ago two men were arrested on suspicion, and an investigation of their rooms furnished plicity in highway robbery. Her parents, who are very respectable people, are broken-hearted over their daughter's disgrace. There is no doubt that her love was the cause of her fall. It may be the means of her rising again if she will give it to Him who said of another sinner:

Her sins which were many are forgiven; for she loved much. (Luke 7: 47.)

A Convict's Mother.

A remarkable instance of a mother's devotion is described by the Figaro. It states that there is now living in the French penal colony of New Caledonia a woman whose devotion to her convict son is so self-sacrificing as to deserve the Montyon prize which is given for the highest virtue. A few years ago, the woman's son, an idle, dissolute fellow, who on the strength of his good looks was supported by his mother and relatives who adored him, was brought to trial for a brutal murder. He would have been sent to the guillotine but for the pleading of his mother, who came to court every day and begged with tears for the life of her son. He had disgraced her and treated her with cruel indifference, but she loved him and her pathetic entreaties saved him from est love known to the world was not inspired by the worthiness of the object but by the Eternal Goodness:

God commendeth his love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. (Rom. 5: 8)

A Long Lost Daughter.

A joyful reunion of a mother and a daughter after a separation of thirteen years took place in Chicago recently. In 1883, a widow with three children was making a painful effort in Kansas City, Mo., to earn a living for herself and family. She managed to support them until sickness came upon her and she could work no longer. Her situation was made known and benevolent people came forward with offers to adopt her children. The widow was reluctant to part with them, but concern for their welfare at last overcame her natural affection and she consented to their being received into the families of the people who had offered them homes. It seemed for some time as if she would die, but eventually she recovered sufficiently to make the voyage to her native town in England where she lived until she had regained her strength. There, she married again and returned to America. Her husband being prosperous, she desired to regain possession of her children. But her elder daughter was grown up and was married, her son had grown to manhood and had settled in Chicago; and her baby daughter she could not find. The mother longed for her inexpressibly and began a protracted search for her. Many clues were followed up in vain. At length she heard of a man in Chicago who had adopted a little girl about the time she gave up her own child. He could not be found, but his wife had preserved the clothes the child wore when she had been received, and these were sent to the mother for examination. She recognized them at once and went to Chicago where she had the joy of finding her daughter, now a beautiful girl of sixteen. It may be hoped that the daughter is as glad at the reunion as the mother. It would be a great grief to the mother if, after her long search, she found that her daughter had no love for her, and was content to remain with the people who had adopted her. Yet how often has the voice of God calling to his children, met with such indifference, and he has spoken them vainly.

I have spoken unto them but they have not heard, and I have called unto them but they have not answered. (Jer. 35: 17.)

Diamonds from Niagara.

A telegraphic despatch from Washington, D. C., to the New York Herald, reports the preparation of a scheme for turning the electric power of Niagara Falls to a new purpose. A scientist of some eminence proposes to build a laboratory in proximity to the Falls for the manufacture of diamonds. It has long been known that diamonds could be made out of charcoal, but the process was so expensive and the results so poor that the artificial gem was almost as costly as the natural product, and by no means so hard or brilliant. The Washington scientist declares that all that is needed is a higher voltage of electricity than has hitherto been applied, and a purer carbon to work upon. He proposes to obtain the purest carbon that can be had from the coal mines, which can be purchased at a comparatively low price, and to submit it to a force of electricity of at least six thousand volts. He believes that this power, which can be had at Niagara, will suffice within a few days to crystallize the carbon. It is supposed that nature requires a million years to do this work of crystallization by natural process, but the scientist has convinced himself that electricity directly applied in this enormously concentrated form will effect the same result. He hopes, in this way, to turn out from his laboratory diamonds that will rival the Kohinoor in size and lustre at a very small expense. Whether the man is a dreamer remains to be proved. Electricity has performed so many wonders that it is possible it may be able to turn a piece of carbon into a jewel as magnificent as those produced by nature. Transformation does take place in the spiritual world. The jewels which will adorn the crown of Christ will not be of nature's forming, but those which have been transformed from material more unpromising than carbon.

The Lord their God shall save them in that day; they shall be as the stones of a crown. (Zech. 9: 16.)

clear proof of their guilt. Several articles of jewelry which had been taken from the victims of the highway robberies were found concealed in their apartments. Further investigation developed the fact that more than one of the victims had been friends of the daughter of the janitor who had charge of the house in which the prisoners lived. A curious coincidence was that each victim had been "held up" after taking a walk with this young lady. The police suspected that she was concerned in the robberies, to extract a confession from the prisoners. It was found that the girl was in love with one of the prisoners, and eventually the other prisoner made a confession incriminating her. He said that she was so infatuated with his companion that she would do whatever he wished. She had been persuaded to make the acquaintance of men who were known to carry considerable sums of money, and after a time to invite their escort to a lonely part of the outskirts of the city. They usually consented, and she would then notify her lover, who, with his companion, would rob the man on his way home. The girl has accordingly been arrested. She is said to be a modest, intelligent, beautiful girl, whom no one would dream of suspecting of com-execution. He was condemned to penal servitude in New Caledonia. The mother sold her furniture, her cow and chickens, and followed him. She managed to obtain employment by washing and scrubbing and is barely able to maintain herself. But, however poor she may be, even if she cannot buy a meal for herself, she never fails to bring a dinner to her son. Every day, she makes her way to the quarry where, with a ball and chain around his ankle, he is employed in breaking stones. She carries a basket in which there is some hot soup and some little delicacy, that she has earned by toiling like a slave. The son eats it greedily never utters a word of thanks, nor kisses the old woman. He is utterly incorrigible and has killed one of his fellow-prisoners since he has been in the prison. He would have been executed for that offence, but for the regard the authorities had for his mother's feelings. Yet he has not the least affection for her, insults her and despises her; but he is her son, and she lavishes all her love upon him and is killing herself with work and privation that he may have his daily meal. It is marvelous that a being so depraved should have inspired a love so devoted, but as we wonder at it, we remember that the great-

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

"Puzzled One," Syracuse, N. Y. 1. In Genesis 4:17, there is a reference to Cain's wife. Whom could he have married if there were no other persons in the world but those mentioned in the sacred history? Where is the land of Nod in which he found refuge?

1. If you accept the historical truth of the Book of Genesis, you have no alternative but to believe that Cain married a sister whose birth is not recorded. The expression used Genesis 3:16 would lead us to believe that many children must have been born of whom no mention is made. The question is an old one, and many suggestions have been made by way of solution, but the one given above is the only one consistent with the doctrine of the historic accuracy of the Bible. 2. The land of Nod cannot now be identified. The Hebrew word means "Flight," and may simply have been used as a general term indicating a place of exile.

Reader, Wilkesbarre, Pa. Some people here insist that we ought to wash each other's feet, and quote John 13:14, which seems conclusive. Is it a duty?

It is not a duty as a church rite. If there were need of such a thing through the inability of a brother to perform it for himself, the Christian ought to do it, as he would render any other service that is required. It was considered menial work in Palestine at the time. Men wore sandals with the top of the foot bare, and after a walk on a hot, dusty road, the washing of the feet was very refreshing. The lowest servant in the house was usually assigned to the work of washing the feet of the guests. Christ's command was practically to be willing to do a servant's work. His disciples had been disputing who should be the greatest. He gave them an object lesson of humility and told them to do as he had done, and consider no task too menial for them to perform if there was need. There are many better ways of obeying the spirit of Christ's command than that of washing a man's feet.

Subscriber, Fall River, Mass. I fear I have committed the unpardonable sin mentioned in Matt. 12:32. I am in great distress. Can you tell me what that sin is?

Many conjectures have been made as to its exact nature. The one generally accepted is based on the context. The Pharisees being unable to deny the miracles, explained them on the theory that Christ was possessed by a devil, and that Satan gave him the power to perform miracles. This insult to the Holy Spirit showed such perverse malignity that Christ said it was beyond forgiveness. Theologians are divided as to the possibility of committing it in the present time. Those who believe it may be committed, think it consists in ridiculing the operations of the Holy Spirit in conversions as at revivals. Your distress is a strong ground for believing that you have not committed it. A person who had committed the unpardonable sin would not be in distress, but would be callous and indifferent.

L. M. E., Brooklyn, N. Y. Is it any use for a backslider to try to regain his lost position? In Hebrews 6:4 it says that it is impossible for those who have been once enlightened to be renewed if they fall away.

It is certainly of use for the backslider to try, and he is encouraged to do so by many explicit promises of pardon and restoration. (See Job. 22:23; Jer. 3:12; Micah 7:19; 1 John 1:9, etc.) The passage you refer to in Hebrews is not a threat, but a statement of experience. It does not refer so much to backsliders as to those who have a theoretical knowledge of the way of salvation, and have deliberately rejected it. They have tasted of divine things, but have not drunk deeply of the water of life. Every clergyman knows that none are so hard to be won as those who have been very near to the kingdom of God without entering it. They are disappointed. The writer of the Epistle had evidently been in contact with such persons, and he declared it impossible to convert them, but nothing is impossible with God.

Mitron, Topeka, Kan. Do you think it right for women to conduct a Christian behavior meeting in a church when the Apostle enjoined them to silence? (See 1 Cor. 14:34.)

Who better a woman, if converted and qualified, is perfectly justified in conducting such a meeting. A literal obedience to the injunction of the Apostle would prevent her even joining in the singing, which would be ridiculous. The apostle had reasons for his prohibition which do not exist to-day. In Corinth and other cities of his time the position of women in society was one of subjection. The only women who were prominent and free of restraint were women of bad character. If he had permitted women to take a prominent part in the infant church it would have caused reproach. People would have charged him with encouraging boldness and immodesty. Paul adopted his usual course of avoiding any shock to prejudice. Another instance of it is in his dealing with the question of eating meat sacrificed to idols. He thought it nonsensical (See 1 Cor. 4:13), but he yielded to avoid hurting the conscience of others. Had he lived in our day we do not think he would have written the passage to which you refer.

Reader, W. Va. 1. Does Paul intimate in 1 Cor. 6:9 that women may not be saved when he says that the effeminate are excluded? 2. Does the prohibition against inordinate affection (Col. 3:3) imply that we are not to dearly love our families and Christian friends?

1. No, Paul is not speaking of women at all, but of men who at that time in Corinth and if they knew them to be unscriptural. On each side of the dispute are men of learning and eminent piety who differ diametrically and who believe that the mode they favor is the Scriptural one. Hundreds of volumes have been written on the subject, but neither side is convinced. 2. There is no evidence. The subject seems to have had unpleasant associations in Paul's day, otherwise he would not have thanked God he had baptized so few (see 1 Cor. 1:14). 3. Mention is made (Acts 16, 15, 33) of the baptism of households in instances where the head of a family became a believer, and they may have included infants, or may not.

Old Subscriber, Scranton, Pa. 1. Why do we observe the first day of the week instead of the seventh day as the Sabbath? Is there any command in the Bible to observe Sunday as the Sabbath? 2. When was the change first made?

1. We observe Sunday in celebration of our Lord's resurrection from the dead which is believed to have taken place on that day. It was the culminating evidence of Christ's divinity and changed the darkness and gloom of Calvary into joy and hope. It was natural that the day should become, especially to Gentile Christians a holy, sacred day far more delightful than the Jewish Sabbath, the observance of which was burdened with absurd and trivial restrictions. A man must not carry a walking-stick or a pocket-handkerchief on that day because that would be carrying a burden. He must not give water to a thirsty animal, must not kindle a fire in his home and must not do other ordinary duties. Christ set the example of disregarding these prohibitions. He healed the sick on the Sabbath, bade a man whom he had healed take up his bed and carry it on the Sabbath, and defended his disciples for plucking the ears of corn. There is body. Christ's parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke 16:22-31) is far removed from the idea of a sleep in his grave. His assurance to the penitent thief (Luke 23:43) is of a like character though a different construction is placed upon it by some eminent scholars. The appearance of Moses on the Mount of Transfiguration is another ground for belief in conscious existence. But the strongest ground appears to us to be Paul's expression (Phil. 1:23) of his preference for death over life. He desired to depart "and to be with Christ which is far better." A man so full of energy and love of active service would not have thought it far better to be asleep in the grave than to be working for his Master. He evidently thought that death would admit him at once to the presence of the Lord.

Not necessarily. An evolutionist may be an infidel, but he may be a sincere Christian. There are many clergymen who are preaching the Gospel and doing faithful Christian service, who hold the doctrine of evolution. You must remember that evolution does not account or profess to account for the origin of matter; it deals with the process of development and propounds a theory of its various stages. Christian evolutionists regard the doctrine as showing the manner in which God worked in the production of the universe. Even agnostic evolutionists admit that there must have been a potent force in operation of which evolution cannot tell us anything. The real difficulty the Christian evolutionists have in reconciling their doctrine with their theology, is as to the Fall. Believing that the progress of man was always upward, they are obliged to reject the doctrine that man fell from a state of perfection by eating the forbidden fruit.

Clericus, Toronto, Ont. What authority has the Apostles' Creed? Is there any foundation for the claim that it was composed by the Apostles?

All that is known of it is that it is very ancient. Ambrose, who lived in the third century, quotes it as we have it, with the exception of the clause, "He descended into hell." It does not seem probable that it was composed by the Apostles. Luke, in writing the Acts, would not have been likely to omit all mention of so important a matter. Nor would the early Fathers in disputing with heretics have failed to use so concrete and conclusive an argument if they had it at command. It was probably composed after the death of the Apostles, as a summary of their teaching. The Westminster divines in adding it to their catechism wrote: "It is here annexed, not as though it were composed by the Apostles or ought to be esteemed as canonical Scripture, but because it is a brief sum of the Christian faith agreeable to the Word of God."

MADISON SQUARE, NEW YORK, AFTER THE RECENT GREAT SNOWSTORM.

A snowstorm is a costly luxury in the metropolis. The recent heavy snowfall—the first great storm of the present winter—cost the city $19,000. Hardly had the skies cleared when Street Commissioner Waring had 3500 carts and an army of shovelers briskly at work clearing the streets and by daylight Broadway was absolutely clear, and the main arteries of traffic were comparatively free of snow. In another twenty-four hours, there was hardly a trace of the storm visible where, before, all had been covered with snow. Our photograph affords a view of Madison Square, after a passage had been cleared for vehicles and pedestrians through the deep snowdrifts. Another fall, equal in severity, followed and again the city had to be cleared. It costs forty-two cents per cubic foot to remove the snow, and a five-inch snowfall in New York represents an outlay of $125,000. It is estimated that the two snowstorms cost the city $295,000. Whatever may be said of the beauty of a snowstorm in the country, and however poets may sing its praises, it is by no means a welcome visitor in the city where it impedes traffic, hinders all kinds of business and adds to the misery and suffering of the poor. At the same time, it furnishes a brief employment to thousands of idle men, who see in the falling flakes the opportunity of earning a few dollars by clearing the streets and sidewalks.

other European cities were losing their manhood by degrading vices. 2. Natural affection is never condemned in the Bible. Inordinate affection refers to a love which is ruinous alike to the subject and the object. You may have seen a child spoiled by an affection which could deny him nothing. It is a man's duty to love his wife, but if he loves her to such a degree that he will displease God rather than offend her, he has inordinate affection. If a man is placed in pecuniary embarrassment and he has an opportunity of saving himself by committing forgery and he would not do it on his own account, but will do it because he cannot bear to see his wife and family suffer poverty, that man has the inordinate affection which Paul condemns.

E. C. Day, Cincinnati, O. 1. Which is the Scriptural mode of baptism—immersion or sprinkling? 2. Which was used by Paul in baptizing Gentile converts? 3. Is there any ground for believing that infants were baptized by the apostles?

1. If your question could be answered authoritatively a dispute which has long disturbed the Church would be set at rest. The advocates of either mode are sincere men who would abandon their views without hesitation no direct command to observe Sunday as the Sabbath, and we do not so observe it. It is not a day of rest but a day of consecrated service. When, at the first great Christian council, the question arose whether the Gentile converts were to be required to keep the law, it was decided that they were not. You will see (Acts 15:23, 29) that the Apostles stated explicitly what was expected of the new converts, and added that no other things were required of them. The observance of the seventh day Sabbath was not among the things required. 2. We infer from Acts 20:7, that the first day was observed in Apostolic times. Justin Martyr mentions it as the day of worship in his day, which was A. D. 140, and other early writers show that the practice has been continuous from the time of the first churches.

Bereaved Mother, Jersey City, N. J. Does the soul go to heaven or hell immediately after death, or does it sleep in the grave until the resurrection?

God has not definitely revealed the state of the soul immediately after death. We are, therefore, left to draw inferences from what is revealed. Several passages afford ground for inference, and these appear to us to imply a conscious existence of the soul apart from the Mormon Missionaries.

Gen. Eaton Describes their Methods—Thousands at Work all over the World, Spreading the Doctrines of Polygamy.

SINCE the adoption of Statehood there has been a manifest increase of missionary activity among the Mormons. If Gentiles have found that the mission of common virtues, much less of godliness, was not necessary to the supremacy of Mormon leaders, they have become convinced that piety and personal worth are less conspicuous as characteristics of the missionaries. It is impossible to describe them in word. If they are ever sent because of worth at home, they are undoubtedly frequently sent that those who are their superiors may be rid of a disturbing element. It has been often stated that for this cause Brigham Young in his early experience was sent to England. A single case has been so often mentioned as to become famous. An ex-judge having incurred the displeasure of the leaders was sent on a long mission to Van Dieman's Land. Going on a mission among Christians is understood to be a matter of consecration; going on a Mormon mission is a matter of orders. Should the mission order be disobeyed no one can tell in how many different ways the displeasure of the church may be visited upon the disobedient. This fact must not be overlooked in measuring the zeal of those sent. Mormonism from the first, has emphasized missions. Latter-Day Saints they claim, came to save the world; they were the only saints, all others were Gentiles or heathen. They have divided the most Christian nations into stakes. During the last few years the Edmunds Laws have lain so heavily upon the church, the amount of property illegally collected and held by it and finally taken from it by escheats was so large that the public have heard less of Mormon missions.

Mormon interest in gaining Statehood is explained, if we remember that the United States Constitution is silent upon marriage, that marriage is a subject, which with many others, is left entirely to State regulation. In spite of the Edmunds Laws and in spite of the Mormon manifesto suspending polygamy which followed the enforcement of those laws, it is well known that many Mormons in Utah and especially in out-of-the-way places continue to live in polygamy. All these remnants of the practice may be said to be starting points for its restoration and Bishop Hart, soon after Statehood was entered, did not hesitate to declare that the church would return to its practices. Indeed the doctrine is stated strongly in their Compendium of Faith, revised as late as 1892. If polygamy is restored many anxiously ask, will all the rest of the old order come back? The persecution of Gentiles, apostates and "Jack-Mormons" or those not up in their practice to the requirements of those over them? On the answer to this question, hangs the destiny of Utah—answered wrong, in vain will be the salubrity of its climate, its natural desirableness as a place of residence, indeed all that may constitute its prosperity for the future. Whatever may be said for the leaders, the people are honest, they want to keep their own promises and they want to see the promises of the church kept. The young, generally, and the liberal, progressive element of every age are anxious to bring on the full noon-day splendor of the day of promise which has dawned upon Utah in the last few years.

The number of missionaries sent, since Statehood has been adopted, is variously estimated; the largest estimate gives 2300, the lowest 1000. How does this compare with the number of missionaries sent out by any one of the larger of the Christian Evangelical denominations? A local paper published in Utah gives information from their mission in Brooklyn, N.Y., direct. There were present twenty elders in this mission, distributed as follows:

Seven in New York State, five in Pennsylvania, six in the New England States and two in Canada. New Jersey is occasionally visited by the elders in Brooklyn, which is headquarters. The writer goes on to say, "This most densely populated part of our great Republic is virgin soil for the Gospel. A new generation has grown up since the early work of the missionaries, and millions of people have never seen or heard a Mormon. Baptisms in some parts are quite frequent. Inquiries are coming in from all sides. Elder Richards, the president, is in communication with several prominent people. One of them a Jewish scholar in New York and connected with a periodical printed in Hebrew, has become greatly interested in the work and has offered space in his paper for an occasional exposition of our doctrine. A young Armenian became a convert, recently, and intends to translate some of our tracts into his native language." A good authority reports that twenty missionaries went out from one small town in Utah. Two conferences have been reported well attended in Mississippi. Six years ago Minnesota reported 224, Maryland 457, and far-off Maine 442 faithful followers responsive to Mormon orders. Many of their books are printed in England. A recent telegram states that Mormons in Iowa are planning to erect a college. A Mormon elder is stated to have applied for membership in the Ministers' meeting in his city. The Presbytery of Utah have felt called upon to state in print why they cannot extend Christian fellowship to Mormons. It should be remembered that Mormon missionaries are sent out without salary and compelled to secure their own support and pay their own expenses. They draw many comparisons and contrasts between themselves and Christian missionaries. Good authority reports a Mormon headquarter, located at Chattanooga, Tenn., from which a considerable group of missionaries operate in that and other States. The reporters from the New York press have been seeking information at the Mormon headquarters in Brooklyn. Their reports are instructive. The reporter for the Herald did not describe the place as attractive or the people as winning in their manners. One Mormon present said in reply to the reporter's questions:

"We are here not to do anything aggressive or offensive, but to give those who wish to join our church an opportunity to do so. Why

"How are the divorce laws in Utah, in case I should not like my husband?" I inquired. "There's no need of divorce laws there, for every woman's husband is in duty bound to support his wives, and that's about all they care for, you know," said the elder. "Give a woman the comforts of life and she is not going to not? There are splendid opportunities in the West for young women. If there are features of our church which they do not like, they are not obliged to embrace them. We believe that we are working for the good of mankind."

"Have you secured any converts?"
"Quite a number," he replied.
"Have they been shipped West?"
"Those who desired to go West have been sent West. We do not send converts against their will," was the reply of the Mormon.

"And my transportation?"
"Oh, you need not worry about that. I want you to come over and see me again on Saturday and Sunday. We will go down to the little town in New Jersey, where we will have a meeting, and I'll introduce you to some of the ladies who are going in the next car."

Another journal reports that forty-five converts had been sent West, and still another reports in addition that converts are multiplying so rapidly that a request for twenty more missionaries has been sent to Utah. It quotes Elder Richards as saying:

"Our duty is to go without purse or scrip, but to such as go to Utah we can say that they will find a thrifty and prosperous people among our sect, who, since Utah became a State, represent the majority of the voting power and constitute about two-thirds of the population. The Church now numbers about 300,000 members."

He adds that the elder claims that polygamy is now discountenanced both by church and state.

JOHN EATON.

An African Congregation.

Our church is always full, writes an African Missionary. On a recent occasion there were quite 7,000 present in the church and in the veranda of the church where they hear as well as in the church itself. We sat on the women's side. How nice they all looked in their bark clothes; no odd, gay colors, as you see on the coast, but wherever the eye turned this universal terra-cotta color. Another day we paid a visit to the queen-mother. She is a regular heathen princess, with a grim, hard face that made one quite believe her capable of all the many acts of cruelty which they say she committed. She sat in state on an embroidered Indian rug spread on the ground, holding a large knife in her hand made of copper and brass mixed, and was most autocratic in the way in which she ordered us to stand up and sit down, that she might get every possible view of us. One could not help contrasting her with the Christian women—the difference is most marked.

failed to convert was more communicative. She said, in reply to a question:

"I was informed that several of the women I had seen were going West in the 'next car.' I was not delighted at the prospect of having them for companions."

"Having decided that there was nothing in further discussion, I prepared to take my departure. 'There is no doubt that you are a capable and willing girl,' said the elder, 'and if you will go to Salt Lake I will give you a letter of introduction and commendation to some wealthy brother there who will care for you most tenderly until I come.'"

"And then what?" I asked. "We might find it advisable and desirable for you to marry," he said. This sort of talk made me mad. "How many times could I marry?" I asked, "and how many husbands could I support there if I became very successful in my business career?"

JESSIE'S AFFAIRS.

BY

AMELIA E. BARR.

"W. E. A. I. T. H." continued John, "is given to be spent in good works, and the holders are agents for him who declares the 'silver and the gold are mine.' As for me I should fear the awful responsibility of wealth. 'Godliness with contentment' is the great gain I desire."

"Yet you are admitting that wealth is a power for good."

"At the same time, I do not say it is necessary for the noblest work. Did Paul, or Luther, or Whitefield, or Wesley depend upon it? Indeed, no! When Pope Leo the Tenth realized that Luther could not be bought, and said angrily, 'this German beast cares nothing for gold,' he hit the truth about all great moral leaders. As a social regenerator, gold, in the hands of a good man, is a potent factor. It can build churches, and colleges, and libraries. It can bind men together with the iron ties of railways, and cables, and telegraphs. It can prepare succor for the sick and dying in hospitals. It has a thousand great works to do, for the uplifting and comforting of humanity. But if wealth is not spent in this manner, then the increase of wealth means only the increase of misery."

"But John, how few rich men do spend their wealth in social regeneration. They hoard it and luxuriate in it, and then leave it to their children."

"Then they must pay the dreadful penalty of false stewards. Their hearts will grow as fat as brawn, and cold as ice, until upon their sinful selfishness crashes the awful message—'Thou fool! This night!'"

"John you terrify me. Are we then to live only for others?"

"Oh, Jessie, in living for others we live for ourselves best, and most of all. We are the children of the King of heaven and earth, and we serve him not for wages but for love. We are taking the journey of life through this world on his order. We are 'in the King's highway.'"

"It is a very sorrowful and dangerous way to many."

"It is, Jessie. The devils of murder and robbery, of drunkenness and lust, of greed and oppressions of every description are to be met on it. Apollyon has straddled over the whole width of the way; but then, what are we here for but to 'prepare the way of the Lord' and to make its paths clean and straight, and utterly destroy whatever defiles it? When men have done this the millennium will be here."

"You make life such a terribly solemn thing, John."

"Solemn, but sweet; for we have so much love and loving-kindness, as we take it together: father and mother love, brother and sister love, husband and wife love; friends, and books, and neighbors, and fellow-travellers; good men and women, all going the same way—the way of holiness, the King's highway."

"You ought to be a preacher, John, and not a lawyer."

"Every man and woman may be a preacher in the house, in the railway, in the highway and the byway. For instance, in teaching Miss Lloyd music, you may teach her many other things."

"Miss Lloyd is an uncertain quantity, John. She may be able to teach me 'other things.' I will tell you more about Miss Lloyd a month hence. Now John, I have had a hard day and am very tired. I must go to sleep."

"The sleep that rounds our little life, is it a sleep, Kitty?"

"Oh, John, don't set me any more hard questions to-night. I am going to shut my eyes and dream." Then he kissed him, and it must be admitted, just away from her consideration all that he had said. Her interest did not lie in that road at present. She let the thought of riches and the obligations of riches slip from her consciousness, and began to wonder where Steve was, and what he was doing, and if he was thinking of her. Then with a sigh she closed her eyes and whispered to herself—"What is in my heart shall lie quiet a little while. I am tired—tired of everything."

CHAPTER IV.

A STRANGE DINNER PARTY.

The month which Jessie had allowed herself for determining the value of her first kind reception at Lloyd Park, went swiftly away; and during it Alice disappointed none of the expectations her gracious behavior had indicated at the first meeting. Indeed in spite of Jessie's doubting, touchy, individuality, a kind of friendship had grown up between the girls; though Jessie was more and more puzzled, as to what possible circumstances had brought them together. For it was soon evident to her, that Alice was no enthusiast about her music; she would have shirked her lessons, if her conscientious teacher would have allowed her to do so. She preferred evidently to ask Jessie questions and to talk to her endlessly about her life and likings. And though Jessie was not destitute of that dubious dislike and suspicious want of confidence which seems the natural condition between employer and employee, she found it hard to maintain it in the presence of Alice.

Had Jessie known that she was being wooed for Steve's sake, she would have resented the familiarity; but which of us is proof against kindness, we believe to be given freely to our own person and attributes? Jessie's "unselfishness" vanished gradually, before the girlish confidences that followed the usual music lesson; for there was always a delicate little lunch ready at its close; and if people do not become good-natured while eating together, then they ought to drop their association at once, and for ever.

Their first confidence related to Lord Medway. For two weeks he remained at Lloyd Park, and the music lessons were much interrupted by his intrusions. He himself was receiving at the same time a lesson, which his vanity could not comprehend, until it was put into unmistakable English for him. Jessie had divined his admiration at their first meeting; at their second, he made it still less equivocal. He had discovered by this time, that she was present simply as Miss Lloyd's teacher; and his ideas about women were always modified by their rank or wealth. His underhand furtive admiration deeply offended Jessie; but he would not accept such tokens of her annoyance, as it was in her power to give, without making herself and him also unpleasantly conspicuous. At her fourth visit, she found him in the train, when she entered it to return to her home; and he immediately addressed her in language, whose affectionate tenor there was no mistaking.

She looked at him with a calm and sovereign contempt, and answered, "We have nothing in common, sir. My affections are placed far beyond you. I would not marry you for all the coronets in England."

He flattered, but he was angry enough, as he continued—"I did not ask you to marry me. Telling a pretty girl you love her is a long way from wishing to marry her."

"Not in my case, sir. Loving a girl is the way to marry her, as I have been taught. But there is no question of love between you and me. I should find it impossible on my part."

"You are a saucy little minx. And yet, you are so piquantly and provokingly tempting, that I intend to—"

"If you say another word to me, sir, I will report you to the conductor. Therefore, if you do not wish to be left on the roadside, you will do well to find another seat. I will not endure your company any longer."

Then he lifted his hat and went to the other end of the car, an angry and a mortified man; and Jessie smiled serenely at the courtesy. "It is the force of habit," she thought; "he is one of those creatures, who always lift their hats to women, but never, under any circumstances, respect them." In this decision, however, Jessie was wrong. It was the force of virtue, that for once bared the nobleman's head; and in spite of his mortification he watched the proud, self-respecting girl, with a very sincere admiration and esteem.

When she went to Lloyd Park the following Saturday, Lord Medway was in Newport; and Alice took Jessie into her confidence. "I think he wishes me to marry him," she said, "and perhaps I may do so; for father desires the match very much. Have you ever been in love, Jessie?" she asked.

"No—not quite—that is, I don't know. I have met a young man lately whom I could love, if it was prudent to do so."

"Oh, then, you are not in love; you are in prudence. What kind of a young man? Is he handsome?"

SHE FOUND HIM IN THE TRAIN.

"No, and yes. I will tell you what kind of a young man. He was at a Trade's meeting with my brother John and I, one night, and some one speaking there called A, and B, and C, and D, and Nicholas Lloyd, 'hellish incarnations of selfishness and covetousness.' And he leaped on to the platform and told the working-men there and then, to their faces, that they were in their way every bit as selfish and covetous. And a big bullying fellow ordered him to make an apology, and Steve flung off his coat, and flung the man before he knew what had happened."

"Oh, how splendid! I would have given a thousand dollars to have been there! Did you say his name was Steve?"

"Yes; Steve Morrison."

"How can you help loving a man like that? Does he love you? Let me kiss you for him." Her face was one charming smile. Her eyes full of radiant tears. She was thinking to herself, that in spite of the misunderstanding between Steve and his father, Steve would not sit still, and hear his father called a "hellish incarnation." "Good! Good!" she ejaculated; "and indeed, Jessie, I cannot see how you can help loving such a man as that! What hinders?"

"I don't know who he is. He says nothing of his past; nothing of his future; nothing of his friends. He admits that he is lazy, and too fond of travel. He is a fine scholar; and yet, when he needs money, he does any kind of rough, menial work to obtain what he wants—that, and no more. He has the carriage and manners of a well-bred man, and yet he is poor. He is an enigma; and no sensible girl wants to marry an enigma. Now with Lord Medway it is different. You know who, and what he is; and where he comes from; and you may imagine fairly enough, the kind of life you will be likely to lead with him. This Steve Morrison may be a proper person—and he may not."

"Oh, I am sure he is nothing wrong; I think I could trust him."

"You know only the right side of the garment of life. I have seen the rough, frayed inside. I go with John among the laboring classes sometimes, and in our own home, we have learned what pinching and wanting means; not lately, not since John and I could work, but the scars of poverty, are never obliterated, by any number of years. I don't want, therefore, to marry a poor, struggling man. I never wish to see my husband toil and suffer, as my father has done. I could not bear it as sweetly as mother bears it. I should become cross and disappointed, and perhaps wish for anarchy to reign in every one's affairs."

"So then, this poor Steve Morrison, will have to become rich Steve Morrison, before you permit yourself to love him."

"I don't want riches. I want competence and security. I like work. I should be glad to help him; but he must like work also; I mean steady, respectable work."

"I can understand that, to be just and right; and yet, it does seem a pity, that Love has to take money into consideration."

"Money is a never ceasing consideration with the poor. How is it with the rich?"

"Much the same. Do you believe Lord Medway would marry me if I was a poor girl?"

"Perhaps not?"

"I am sure not. I should be as much out of his thoughts as a three-roomed cottage to live in; or a ready-made suit of clothing to wear."

"If you look at the matter in that light, Alice, I would drop it altogether. There ought to be love between you; money is not enough."

"Yet, you will not love without money. I have always read that love was the first and the last thing; that we ought to marry for love, and work for money—and so on."

"We must do as the world does; and not as it says. The world frowns on imprudent marriages. I think it is right Steve himself told the working men that if they married within half-a-dollar of starvation, they are brutally selfish; and they are."

"Nevertheless, I am sorry for the poor splendid fellow. I wish you could love him—just for himself."

"You wish me to marry for love. Do you love Lord Medway?"

"He is pleasant and kind, and I am proud of his position. I like to think of the title I shall bear; of the magnificent old home I shall go to; of the society and travel, yes, and of the grand wedding feast he has promised me. Any girl would like such things; and would not dislike the man who gave them to her, unless he was remarkably ugly or disagreeable. Lord Medway is fairly good-looking; he has an aristocratic way with him; and he professes to think me the loveliest woman he ever saw. After he went to Newport, certainly missed him for a day or two, suppose then I have a little love for him—a little love, which time and circumstances may make more."

"Still, Alice, I do not think you are in love. I remember the first night I met Steve. We were all sitting at dinner when he came to us. I thought I had never seen a man with such a radiant face."

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning January 17. II. Chron. 30: 13-27.

COMMON parlance has given a meaning to the word, revival, that it did not originally convey. When we hear that there has been a revival in a town, we suppose that some evangelist has been there teaching the Gospel with eloquence, and leading with sinners to accept the offer of salvation and that men who have not previously known Christ have turned from sin and have given themselves to the Lord. In one sense this is a revival inasmuch as it is a renewal of energy that was latent. The word, however, in its first and natural sense implies a quickening of the spiritual life in the hearts of Christian people, a renewed consecration, a trimming of the lamp, a tightening of the grip on God's truth, a fresh promise and on his power. It is a new life, a fresh accession of the energy of the Holy Spirit, operating on souls responsive to the influence. Its effects are usually seen in a withdrawal of worldly Christians from scenes of frivolous amusement, a relaxation of the numbing struggle after wealth and an increase in attention to the preaching of the Gospel and to prayer.

That such times are very necessary to the life of the church every observer knows. Times of deadness and coldness inevitably come. Those who are in the world are apt to become of the world. Principles and practices in vogue society insensibly influence the Christian who is not living near to God and take a boat on a strong current, he is carried out of his course. The revival serves a useful purpose if it causes him to make an examination analogous to the work known to the sailor as taking the reckoning. The captain takes an observation of the sun and with his chronometer and his chart works out a reckoning by which he finds out his exact position on the wild ocean desert. If the wind or the current has carried him out of his course, he discovers the fact and he gives a new order to the man at the wheel. If a preacher can induce his hearers to perform a like duty as to the spiritual voyage, a revival is likely to follow. There will be regret for wasted time, sorrow for neglected prayer and overlooked opportunities of usefulness, and an increased realization of the paramount importance of spiritual growth. This is revival in its true sense, if it leads to amendment and earnest prayer or more grace.

When this spiritual quickening takes place, there is nearly always an accession to the church from the world. It is partly due to direct effort. When the Christian realizes his privileges and the power of true godliness in his own life and the joy of union with Christ, he tries to bring others into the fold. Appeals are made to men with whom he comes in contact in business and social life, and assurances are given that religion increases and does not diminish the happiness of life. Such efforts usually have more power than any sermon, being disinterested and non-professional. Besides this there is a silent influence of a very potent kind proceeding from a man who is living in close communion with God, that reaches far and wide. As the steel filings that adhere to a magnet themselves become magnetic, so the soul that is in close contact with Christ draws others to him. This is the mechanism of a revival of the right kind. But it is the mechanism only. The real Power operating, is the Holy Spirit, the vital force which moves in favorable conditions. Like the wind, which bloweth as it listeth, the Spirit comes, but if no sails are set, if there is no receptive disposition, the Power has no effect, almighty as it is. God does not force men into his kingdom. He will cooperate with the willing soul and will make that soul, though it be weak as the feeblest thing in creation, strong with his strength. Thus a revival is never the result of organization, though organization may be an effective element in it. The power is of God, and by that alone can it come, but when organization in a church shows that a revival is desired, and there is faith to expect it the power comes.

"BEHOLD THE BRIDGROOM!"

ARISE! Oh, bride, and don thy garments white,
Set wide thy door.
Let all thy windows blaze with welcoming light.
Waiting is o'er.
Awake! Arise! nor longer slumbering lie,
The King, thy Bridgroom, surely draweth nigh.
Awake! Arise! though he hath tarried long,
And late the hour.
Hearken! hear thou afar, that glorious song.
Rising in power?
Myriads of voices chant that heavenly strain;
Oh, bride, be ready! join the glad refrain.
Let not the world lull thee to sensuous rest,
Biding in ease.
Arise! prepare for thy majestic Guest,
Indifference cease.
Oh, haste thee! haste thee! lest thou be too late;
The bridal train is even at thy gate.
Dost thou still linger? Hast thou then forgot?
He came to save,
And yet, his very own, received him not,
Nor welcome gave.
Oh, bride, wilt thou so cold, so careless be?
He bore the cross, the blood-stained cross, for thee.

HAND IN HAND WITH ANGELS.

HAND in hand with angels
Through the world we go;
Brighter eyes are on us
Than we blind ones know;
Tenderer voices cheer us
Than we deaf ones own;
Never, walking heavenward
Can we walk alone.
Hand in hand with angels,
In the busy street,
By the glowing hearth-fires—
Everywhere—we meet.
Though unfledged and songless,
Birds of paradise;
Heaven looks at us daily
Out of human eyes.
Hand in hand with angels,
Oft in menial guise;
By the same straight pathway
Prince and beggar rise.
If we drop the fingers,
Toil-embrowed and worn,
Then one link with heaven
From our life is torn.
Hand in hand with angels!
Blessed so to be!
Helped are all the helpers;
Giving light, they see.
He who aids another
Strengthens more than one;
Sinking earth he grapples
To the great white throne.

The Lord's Coming.

What the Scriptures Teach as to its Manner and Time.

BY REV. CAPEL MOLYNEAUX, B. A.

HE will come in person, not as some contend in spirit and in doctrine, or by the messenger of death. Jesus Christ, who lived and died on earth, and afterwards rose and ascended into heaven, will himself return, the same Jesus Christ, the same Man, who once trod this earth's highway, "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief;" even he the same, though in highest glory instead of deep humiliation; though garbed in light instead of shrouded in a "body marred more than any man"—otherwise the same, even as the angels testified, "this same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven."

When, and wheresoever, the Bible says the Son of Man will come, I believe it means precisely what it does say, that the Son of Man will come, and nothing else! and to explain this of anything else—of death, the destruction of Jerusalem, or even the outpouring of the Spirit, or of anything whatever, but what the words evidently declare—does seem to me to confound things palpably different, as words can make them.

He will come suddenly! When the world is crying "peace, peace;" when the remote expectation of his coming shall not generally prevail; when men are eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage; planting, buying, selling, absorbed in their ordinary concerns, overcharged with cares, interests, and pleasures of this world; when the heart whispers, if the lips give not birth to the sentiment, "Where is the promise of his coming?" Then, at such a time, even then, he will come!

He will come manifestly. "Every eye shall see him." It will be clear, palpable as the sun at noon-day. The advent will be "as the lightning which lighteneth from one end of heaven to the other"—manifest as lightning, clearly manifest, at the same moment everywhere. This, observe, the universal manifestation, and not the rapidity of his coming, is the object of this beautiful illustration. The Lord, in the context to the passage (Matt. 24: 21-28) where the illustration occurs, is warning his disciples against false Christs who will appear in the latter days, and deceive many. He bids his people to be on their guard, and when they shall hear it said, "Behold he is in the desert," they are not to "go forth;" "behold he is in the secret chambers," they are to "believe it not." For, he adds, "as the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be"—so! even as evident, clear, manifest, as the lightning. There shall, therefore, be no doubt or possibility of questioning about it; no need to go forth, and search and look for it; it shall not be in a corner, or in a chamber, or in a desert! No man shall tell his neighbor it is come—for his neighbor, like himself, shall see it! It shall be terribly obvious—seen alike in the palace and the cottage; in the mansion and the cabin; in the court and the change, and the field; in the squares and the lanes of the city; in the brilliant assembly and the darkest abode of squalid destitution; where men are revelling, and where men are praying; where the world is decked out in fashion's gaudiest plumage, and where rags and tatters are the only habiliment. It will burst on all, an appalling, unmistakable reality—on all alike, all without exception, all at once. "Even as the lightning which lighteneth from one end of heaven to the other, so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be."

When will the Lord come? We do not know exactly, but we know where it will come relatively. Thus we are informed by the Lord himself that "when the Gospel shall be preached as a witness to all nations," then the end, which includes, or terminates in the advent, shall come; again, Paul testifies that when the man of sin shall be revealed, then at the close of his day, the "advent" of our Lord shall come, for the man of sin is to be destroyed thereby.

The Gift of Imagination.*

HOW signal a place does the imagination hold in the realm of science and invention. Reason itself is only an under-servant. It has no creative skill. Memory makes no discoveries. But the imagination is a wonder worker. One day, chancing upon a large bone of the mammoth in the Black Forest, Oken, the German naturalist, exclaimed: "This is a part of a spinal column." The eyes of the scientist saw only one of the vertebrae, but to that one bone his imagination added frame, limb and head, then clothed the skeleton with skin, and saw the giant of animals moving through the forest. In that hour the imagination wrought a revolution in the science of anatomy. Similarly, this creative faculty in Goethe gave botany a new scientific basis. Sitting in his favorite seat near the castle of Heidelberg one day the great poet was picking in pieces an oak leaf. Suddenly his imagination transformed the leaf. Under its touch the central stalk lifted itself up and became the trunk of the tree; the veins of the leaf were extended and became boughs and branches; each filament became a leaf and spray, the imagination revealed each petal and stamen and pistil, as after the leaf type, and gave a new philosophy to the science of herbs and shrubs. When a pistachio tree in Paris with only female blossoms suddenly bore nuts, the mind of a scientist suggested that some other rich man had imported a tree with male flowers, and careful search revealed that tree many miles away.

And in every department of science this faculty bridges over chasms between discovered truths. Even Newton's discovery was the gift of imagination. When the eyes of the scientist saw the falling apple it was his vision faculty that leaped through space and saw the falling moon. When the western trade winds, blowing for weeks, had cast the drift wood upon the shores of Spain, Columbus' eyes fell not only upon the strange wood but also upon a pebble caught in the crevice. But his imagination leaped from the pebble to the Western continent of which the stone was a part, and from the tree to the forest in which it grew.

This faculty has performed a similar work in the realm of mechanics. Watt tells us that his engine worked in his mind years before it worked in his shop. In his biography Milton recognizes the beauty of the trees and flowers he culled from earth's landscapes and gardens, but in his "Paradise Lost," his imagination beheld an Eden fairer than any scene yet found on earth. Napoleon believed that every battle was won by the imagination. While his soldiers slept, the great Corsican marshaled his troops, hurled them against the enemy, and won the victory in his mind the night before the battle was fought. Even the orator like Webster must be described as one who sees his argument in the air before he writes it upon the page: just as Handel thought he heard the music falling from the sky more rapidly than his hand could fasten the notes upon the musical bars. Thus every new tool and picture, every new temple or law or reform has been the imagination's gift to man.

And when imagination has achieved for man his progress, happiness, and culture, it goes on to help him to gain personal worth and character. Above every noble soul hangs a vision of things higher, better and sweeter. It causes the best men even in their best moods to feel that better things still are possible. By sweet vision it tempts men upward, just as of the old bees were lured onward by the honey dropped through the hunter's hands. The vision of a higher path leads discontented men with to-day's achievement and takes the flavor out of yesterday's victory. In such hours it is not enough that men have bread and raiment, or are better than their fellows. The soul is filled with nameless yearnings and longings. The deeper convictions, long hidden, begin to stir and strain, even as in June the seed aches with its hidden harvest.

TWO youths, tired of life as only the young can be, sought the Prophet who dwelt alone. One youth said, "O Prophet, I have had all wealth and pursued all pleasures; but I have not found happiness." "It could not be," said the Prophet, "pleasure is in things without. Happiness is from things within." "True, O Prophet," said the other youth, "so I believed; and I sought to know all mysteries and all knowledge, knowing that happiness is within. But I, too, have not found happiness."

The sun was shining with midday strength, and the Prophet bade him look fixedly at its shining orb. For an instant the youth turned eager and wistful eyes towards the heavens, and then he withdrew his gaze as one in pain. And the Prophet said, "What seest thou?" and he said, "I see blackness everywhere. The grass grows black, and the flowers are black, and even your faces are darkened to me." And the Prophet said, "Mysteries thou canst not fathom. None can look on God's face and live. We know in part. Happiness is not in knowledge." Then there was silence while the young man's eyes recovered. And then said the Prophet, "Look once more, but look not on the heaven but on the earth." And the young man looked—and was glad; for meadow, stream, and hill were bathed in happy sunlight. And the Prophet said, "What seest thou of heaven?" And the youth answered, "I see the sunlight everywhere."

Then said the Prophet, "Be content. Mind not high things. Seek not to know mysteries. But seek goodness, purity, righteousness, and kindness, and thou shalt see God's sunlight everywhere; and thou shalt find happiness within. Herein is the blessing of the Lord, that a man be satisfied in righteousness."

Then the youths left the Prophet; and, as they journeyed to their city again, he that had sought to know mysteries said: "I remember that it is written, 'In thy light shall we see light.'" And the other, who had sought happiness in pleasure, made answer: "I, too, remember One who said, 'I am the Door. By me if any man enter in he shall be saved.'"

The moment this is realized, the whole conception of life changes. As long as we are blinded by worldly ideas, and falsely imagine that life consists in the abundance of the things which a man possesses, we are keenly alive to our own misfortunes. We are inclined to declare that life is not worth living, because we measure the worth of life by material standards. But when we begin to perceive that life is moral discipline, and its end the perfecting of character, we can be content with food and raiment, for we are sure that a nobler enrichment is going forward. The varied experiences of life are working towards that happiness which is above all earthly gain, because it is a happiness within ourselves, a happiness of disposition and character. If happiness consists in the fulfilment of the end of our being, human happiness must be found in growing into that likeness in which we were made, and in the attaining of which we reach our true maturity, and realize the purpose of God. It is thus that man is brought to understand what is meant by fellowship with God. Discord within and meanness of conscience mean want of harmony between what our lives are and what they ought to be; they reveal how far we are from fulfilling the true purpose of life; they show that we are out of harmony with the order of our life, that is with the will of God. Peace within means the end of this discord, the harmony of our will with God's will. When we desire what he desires for us, our moral dispositions are in sympathy with him, and, this being so, we reach that stage of religious progress which may be called fellowship with God.

Un-Poetic Hymns.*

AS in British letters the sacred verse of Milton, Addison, Pope, and Cowper is a normal form of poetic utterance, so when our representative American poets enter the domain of the religious lyric they but add another evidence of their genuine gift and mission as poets. In this high sense, a hymn from Holmes or Whittier is as appropriate as when it comes from the pen of Hastings or Palmer. Just here it is in place to state that, as we have in English and classical literature debates and orations that were never pronounced in public, so may we expect to find, and do find, some of these sacred lyrics which have been composed with no reference whatever to their use in the exercises of Christian worship, but simply as one of the types in which poetic genius embodies itself, composed as literature, and not specifically as religious literature. Thus Whittier wrote his lyrics "The Eternal Goodness" and "Our Master," which, though not written as hymns, may be so used if need be. Thus Holmes and Bryant and Lowell wrote reflective verse as verse, but so imbued with moral and spiritual life as to make it serviceable in the rites of the Church. In this way, what Brooks calls "the theology of the English poets" has been made an essential and attractive part of English literature.

So, on the other hand, hymns as such should possess some distinctive literary character, should have an artistic as well as a religious quality, and should be in good taste from an esthetic point of view, so as to commend themselves to all students of form and lovers of literary art. The violation of this principle is far too frequent, so frequent as to have brought the whole department of hymnology into peril at the hands of literary critics. The mere fact that such lyrics are composed for the service of the Church and the needs of the common people does not, in their judgment, justify the absence of definite artistic excellence. Readers of taste are often pained by these unliturgical and non-literary effusions that are found in our collections and pass for sacred poetry. In no sense known to criticism can they be called poetry, and should not as such be imposed upon the acceptance of worshippers. It is, indeed, because of the presumable literary ignorance of the people as a whole that they are thus imposed, devoid as they are both of the structure and spirit of genuine verse, ill-conceived and ill-expressed, and worthy of the name of verse only in the sense that the lines are metrical. It is needless to say that much of the hymnology in use by the modern lay evangelist is greatly at fault in this particular, a mere jingle and doggerel and trick of words, as illiterate and unpoetic as verse could well be and be verse at all. It cannot be wondered at that such an order of sacred song should offend the cultivated taste of literary men, and estrange them permanently from the ordinances of the Church.

How People Get On in the World

TO be Successful! This has become one of the grandest tests of merit; for even the Church in our age, has grasped the promise of this life, as well as the next, and begun to look upon a genuine success, one of the legitimate fruits of the Gospel. And when we consider that but for successful men there would be far fewer churches, hospital schools, etc., and vastly crippled missionary and charitable enterprises, we must acknowledge the blessedness of Success, in its general results.

And when we regard it individually, Success is in most cases an inward grace, as well as an external gain. The qualities that have been cultivated in order to attain to it, are in the main excellent qualities; for though people talk "luck," success does not come by chance. This world is run with far too tight a rein to permit of fortuitous events, and Providence beyond all doubt, gives us good things by our own hands.

First, the successful man knows how to wait. Patience is genius, and failures are mostly consummated by want of faith, and want of patience. To concentrate every power on one object, and go directly for it; converging collateral aids, and to be determined to succeed, is to succeed, as a general rule. But if on we begin to doubt, we begin to sprawl; and our days specialties only attain to eminence. We think Admirable Crichtons pleasant to know, but we don't do business with them.

Over-sensitiveness is a great drawback to success. Before men are successful, they must take rebuffs, and plenty of them; but the man bound for the top of the ladder, has that to act of purpose, and that moral bravery finely expressed in one of those wonderful nursery rhymes, which are the unconscious oracles of a dead world. I refer to the famous Man of Thessaly; who

Jumped into a quickset hedge,
And scratched out both his eyes;
But who had the heroic stuff in him, of which success is made; for

When he saw his eyes were out,
With all his might and main,
He jumped into the quickset hedge,
And scratched them in again.

Selfish men, as a rule, do not succeed. Providence helps those who help themselves; much more does he help those who help others, as well as themselves. "The liberal is a devilish liberal thing; and by liberal this shall he stand." There have been hours in the lives of all successful men, when everything depended upon someone throwing them a rope or lending them a hand. It is not only Christianity, it is also bad policy, to keep one's hands too much in one's own pocket. Indeed selfish men are often a wonder to those who know them. They get much and give nothing. They are like those Jews who built themselves ceiled houses, while the house of God lay waste. If they had minded his affairs, he would have minded theirs; for we can't serve God—or man either—for nought. Now, says God of such, "Ye have sown much and bring in little; ye eat, but ye have not enough; ye drink, but ye are not filled with drink; ye clothe ye, but there is none wax; and he that earneth wages, earneth wages, and put it into a bag with holes." Self-reliance is a good thing; but mutual-reliance is a far better thing.

The Preacher, Thinker, Philanthropist, and all men who work with mind and spirit, cannot be paid in matter; therefore their success must be measured by moral and mental influences; and for this reason, the world often calls them "failures," a definition, applicable still more startlingly to men who band together for good causes, which are apparent successes. But these men are not "failures" if we consider that we are eternal. This may take but one step in a century, but it never recedes; and even forlorn hopes, like their glad and glorious days. Beneath the fire of storming batteries, we touch something diviner than earth; and it is in the hottest conflicts, we meet our heavenly brethren.

The world may thank God that there are men and women, who for their convictions and ideals, are content to be what it calls "unsuccessful"—to be of the minority, against the majority. These are the "foolish" one to whom God says "Forward!" and barbarian crumblers, and nations are kindled to a common compassion; and men give their lives to destroy slavery, and their money to feed the hungry, and teach the ignorant. These are the men who make us revolt at masses, who succor desolate women, and nourish orphan children, and protect animal life. Well then, though material success is a great peer for good, there is a higher success than a golden one. Let us not despise it, because it appears so unreal. Beautiful ideals expand hearts that welcome them; and like the lighthouse, guess at springs that have not yet flowed. People may smile at the disproportion between our ideals and realities. Never mind. It is just here that we touch the first step of the ladder, which leads up to the region of light; and to that gloriously comprehensive Divine verdict, "Well done, good and faithful servant!"

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE.

THE NIGHT WIND.

AVE you ever heard the wind go "Yooooo!"
Tis a pitiful sound to hear!
seems to chill you through and through
With a strange and speechless fear.
Is the voice of the night that broods outside,
When folks should be asleep.
And many and many's the time I've cried
In the darkness that brooded far and wide
Over the land and deep:
"Whom do you want, O lonely night,
That you wail the long hours through?"
And the night would say in its ghostly way:
"Yooooo! Yooooo! Yooooo!"
My mother told me long ago,
When I was a little tad,
That when the night went wailing so
Somebody had been bad;
And then when I was snug in bed,
With the blankets drawn up round my head,
I think of what my mother'd said,
And wonder what boy she meant!
And "Who's been bad to-day?" I'd ask
Of the wind that hoarsely blew,
And the voice would say in its meaningful way:
"Yooooo! Yooooo! Yooooo!"
That this was true, I must allow—
You'll not believe it, though!
Yet, though I am quite a model now,
I was not always so.
And if you doubt what things I say,
Suppose you make the test:
Suppose, when you've been bad some day
And up to bed are sent away
From mother and the rest—
Suppose you ask, "Who has been bad?"
And then you'll hear what's true;
For the wind will moan in its ruefullest tone:
"Yooooo! Yooooo! Yooooo!"

Shopping in Mid-winter.

aking Holiday Purchases in Arctic Weather —New York's Crowded Thoroughfares.

VERY winter, as the holidays approach, New York draws to itself as with an irresistible magnet, great multitudes of shoppers. They come from long distances, by train or steamer, and they overflow the hotels, fill the street cars and her conveyances, and in the principal thoroughfares, join with city shoppers in crowding stores and sidewalks to an extent that frequently makes locomotion almost impossible. Our photograph shows a section of the popular Sixth avenue shopping district during holiday week, and it may be accepted as a fair specimen of the condition of many other parts of town. Not only are the mammoth establishments inundated with buyers, but the less pretentious stores find their trade quadrupled in holiday week. For many businesses, the brief season toward the close of December, is the annual harvest, and all their resources are energetically applied to make it as big a harvest as possible. This is especially true of those businesses that deal in such articles, as are specially designed to be used by the purchasers as gifts to friends and relatives. Just how much money is expended in New York City, on purchases during holiday week, it would be difficult to estimate, but it aggregates many millions daily. All classes of society contribute to this extraordinary output of wealth. In the great nurseries, where almost every article may be found on sale, thousands of shoppers crowd the various departments, requiring the services of an army of clerks and saleswomen to attend to their multifarious wants. Almost every nationality is presented in these holiday crowds, and poor and rich may stand alike on an equality and buy at the same counter—the lady in wealth spending her hundreds, while the poor widow, or the hard-worked sewing girl, having only a dollar or two in the world must measure her gifts accordingly. To those who come from the country to shop in the big metropolis for the first time, the mammoth stores on Broadway, Sixth and Eighth avenues, Fourteenth street and Twenty-third street, are a wonderful revelation. Here, in a single building, or group of buildings, perhaps nearly a block in extent, are furniture, jewelry, silks and satins in piece, tailor-made gowns, and the other garments, laces, stationery, millinery, leather goods, toys innumerable, and games for adults: groceries, hats, shoes, music and musical instruments: enough books to stock a good-sized town library, and a thousand other varieties of merchandise. The stranger is bewildered by the seemingly endless variety, and very naturally wonders how such a vast business can possibly be conducted without hopeless confusion. But each department has its responsible head, and system rules everywhere. All purchases are recorded, no matter how insignificant. Trained detectives guard every aisle and watch lest professional pickpockets should enter and attempt to ply their nefarious trade among the unsuspecting shoppers, and they also look out sharply for the "shop-lifters," whose thievish fingers may stray too long among the goods on the counters. Then the great stores have cared for the comfort of their patrons in other ways, by providing reception rooms, restaurants, photograph galleries, and even banks and post-offices, within the limits of their establishment.

Thus, a day or two among the big metropolitan stores, during the holidays, is a pleasant experience, not to be forgotten, especially if one is reasonably well supplied with money, and has the habit of observation which greatly adds to the enjoyment.

New Year's Calls Declining.

Soon the old custom of making New Year's calls will be a thing of the past. This year it was noticeable in many cities that fewer calls were made than ever before. Apropos to the changed style of observing the day, it is interesting to note how it was kept in the time of our forefathers. When the metropolis was Nieuw Amsterdam, Alice Morse Earle tells us, there was a constant controversy between Governor Stuyvesant and the easy-going "little bench of justices" over the celebration. The burgomasters and schepens would not hold court or do any legal business at New Year. Then Stuyvesant sent out a proclamation expressly forbidding on New Year's and May Days any firing, or planting of maypoles or beating of the drum; nor shall there be at those times any wines, brandy or beers dealt out. But it took a more powerful enemy than Stuyvesant to annihilate New Year's Day—it perished under modern indifference and formality. At the beginning of this century the streets were thronged on New Year's Day with all who could not ride; and great four-horse stages packed with hilarious mobs of men rode from house to house visiting any and every friend of any one of the stage load, eating and drinking at every house. Gradually this has died out, or is dying, and the January festival has become decorous and quiet, with hardly a feature left of the old time revelry and indulgence. It is far better as it is.

In the Stepmother's Behalf.

Our "Plea for the Stepmother" which appeared on this page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in Dec. 16 issue, seems to have awakened sympathetic echoes in several quarters. Mr. W. G. H. Meaford, Ont., writes us a remarkably interesting letter in which he says:

I read your plea for the stepmother. Some years ago, when I was quite a young man, it fell to my lot to board among strangers. One cold winter's day, the house door had by some means been left open for a moment, when the father of that household, said, "Please shut that door, for a stepmother's breath is blowing in." No one knows how keenly I felt that remark: for I had a stepmother. But, Oh! such a mother she was to me! There was no coldness in her breath. The atmosphere of the home where she reigned as queen, was warm with her sweet unchanging love. My own mother went to her rest in heaven when I was only three

FRANKLIN'S WHISTLE.

OUR young folks are probably familiar with the story of Franklin and his whistle. It was related in a letter by Benjamin Franklin to a friend in Philadelphia, in 1779, in which he wrote:

When I was a child, about seven years old, my friends on a holiday filled my pockets with coppers. I went directly to a shop where they sold toys for children, and being charmed with the sound of a whistle, that I met by the way in the hands of another boy, I voluntarily offered and gave all my money for one. I then came home, and went whistling all over the house, much pleased with my whistle, but disturbing all the family. My brothers and sisters and cousins, understanding the bargain I had made, told me I had given four times as much for it as it was worth, put me in mind what good things I might have bought with the rest of the money, and laughed at me so much for my folly that I cried with vexation, and the reflection gave me more chagrin than the whistle gave me pleasure. This, however, was afterward of use to me, the impression continuing on my mind so that often when I was tempted to buy some unnecessary thing I said to myself, "Don't give too much for the whistle," and I saved my money. As I grew up, came into the world, and observed the actions of men, I thought I met with many, very many, who gave too much for the whistle.  In short, I conceive that great part of the miseries of mankind are brought upon them by the false estimates they have made of the value of things, and by giving too much for their whistles.

A beautiful statuette of the boy Franklin and his whistle, executed in Carrara marble, my Pasquale Romanelli, has been presented to the Newark, N. J. Public Library by Dr. J. A. Coles and his sister Miss E. S. Coles. It stands as a pedestal of Algonian marble. The figure is very graceful, and the attitude is one of boyish thought. Underneath the statue is the legend "Don't give too much for the whistle," which inculcates a sound, homely philosophy that every boy would do well to keep in view daily with the temptations that arise as he approaches young manhood.

Winter Sunrise in the Woods.

Dr. C. C. Abbott, in a description of a winter stroll in the woods, gives this very charming "bit" from nature: "Decide beforehand whether you will ramble, and make an early start. Sunrise I have always associated with mirth, and sunset with melancholy. It is reasonable to do so. Be astir at sunrise then, and receive the greeting of that lover of the dawn, the blackcap. Chick-a-dee-dee means 'cheerfulness,' as he who hears it quickly learns, for the chill of the early hour is tempered. Those who never see the world at such a time have strange ideas of winter. Frost is a gardener of most excellent taste, and when he has encased seed pods and dry grass in crystal, all their beauty is restored."

How Japanese Children Count.

"We count on the knuckles," said a bright little Japanese lad. "The knuckles are the long months and the spaces between them the short ones. The first knuckle is January, long, and the space between is February, short, and so on to the knuckle on the little finger, which is July. Then you repeat on the knuckle of the little finger, which is also August, and go back and end on the knuckle of the second finger, which is December."

weeks old, so that I have no personal remembrance of her.

No man ever had a better mother than my stepmother proved to me. Her relationships to me, through all my childhood, crowd upon me to this day in sweet, tender, and hallowed memories. The longer I live, the more do I revere her for that beautiful Christly life, which seems to glow with a richer radiance, the further time carries me away from her. There may be some stepmothers who are not all they should be, but if the children who have stepmothers, would only treat those mothers with loving and kindly consideration, instead of treating them with coldness and suspicion, the harshness of such mothers would soon become only a forgotten proverb.

Dull Boys who Became Famous.

Premature brightness, or precocity, is not always a desirable trait in children, nor is dullness always an evidence of lack of brains. Parents should not be discouraged because their children are not always bright as those of their neighbors. When Isaac Barrow was a boy he appeared so stupid that his father said, if God took away any of his children he hoped it would be Isaac. Yet that boy lived to be one of the greatest divines of the Church of England. Douglas Jerrold was also a dull boy, and Napoleon's teacher said he would need a gimlet to put learning into the head of the future conqueror of Europe. Sir Walter Scott, Dryden, Swift, Goldsmith, Gibbon, Chatterton and many others were notably dull boys. General Grant was also called dull by his neighbors and schoolboy friends.

Requests for Prayer.

AT the Converts' Sunday Afternoon Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission, prayer was offered on Dec. 20, in accordance with the requests of many persons, among whom the following ask the prayers of our readers:

For the Conversion of Sorrowing Mother, of Relatives and Friends.

Yorktown, N. J., asks prayer for the conversion of her son, who is sick, and that he may live to serve Christ.—Reader, Ft. Worth, Ill., that two brothers may give themselves to the Lord.—Constant Reader, Saco, Me., that a dear son may realize his need of a Saviour and yield himself to Christ.—Friend, Russellville, Tenn., for the conversion of a friend and his wife and children.—J. M. P., Delhi, Ia., that the peace which passeth understanding may be found by an elderly lady who is earnestly seeking Christ.—J. A. Stockton, Manitoba, that God would look in mercy on six sons, who are intent on worldly things and indifferent to the concerns of their souls, and that they might be aroused to seek Christ.—Forsaken Mother, Hampton, Va., for the conversion of her daughters and their husbands, who are far away from Christ and are neglectful of their filial duties.—Aged Widow, Miltona, Minn., for the conversion of an aged man.—Reader, Sheekshumpy, Pa., that a dear son who once made a profession of faith, but has been led into sin, may be truly converted and be true to Christ.—E. R. R., Altamont, Kans., that a wayward son may be brought to Christ.—H. E. L. C., for the conversion of a young man whose life is being spoiled by his bondage to liquor.—W. D. Kittanning, Pa., that light may be granted to a young man who is seeking Christ, but is in thick darkness; also that his family may be guided to the Saviour.—Subscriber, Hastings, Minn., for the conversion of a wayward son, and of a daughter who is being prejudiced against religion by an unbelieving husband.—Praying Mother, Alberta, Can., that God would touch the hearts of her three sons and bring them into his fold.—Sorrowing Sister, Trumansburg, N. Y., for the conversion of husband, son, and daughter, and that present affliction may be sanctified to spiritual progress.—Reader, Farmington, Cal., for the salvation of a brother who has become the slave of strong drink, and that he may turn from his evil ways to serve the Lord with all his heart.—Broken Hearted Mother, Mt. Gilead, O., that her son-in-law, who is harassing his wife and family, may have a new heart given to him, and may learn of Christ to be kind and loving to others.—Praying Mother, Demorest Ga., for the conversion of a son-in-law whose drunkenness and profanity are making his family miserable, and that he may have strength to lead a new life in Christ.—W. C. Key West, Fla., that God would grant converting grace to a whole family, consisting of husband, wife, two sons and a daughter, who seem unable to give up their own ways and seek salvation through Christ alone; also that a wayward brother who is in bondage to drink and evil passions, may be delivered and made a new creature in Christ.—Praying Mother, Camp Creek, S. Dak., that God would deliver her husband from his love of strong drink and make him a good man.—Mother, Clinton, Iowa, for the conversion of her husband and four children.—Father and Mother in Nebraska, that a dear son who has caused shame and sorrow to his parents, may be brought to repentance and be saved through Christ.—Mother, Wetmore, Kan., for the salvation of her son, a young man for whom many prayers have been offered.—Grieved Wife, West Superior, Wis., that her husband may be cured of his propensity for strong drink, and may be made a true child of God.—Reader, Licknell, Ind., for the conversion of a son.—"One who believes," for the conversion of a dear friend whose reason is imperilled by the consequences of a sinful life, and that he may have strength to renounce his sins.—M. B., Mithell, Colo., for the conversion of a very wicked man, who keeps a saloon and is leading his neighbors to ruin, and that his saloon may be closed.—A. C. J., Richmond, Va., that God in his mercy would bring her three sons and her daughter into the kingdom.—"Immanuel," that God would bring an unfaithful wife of a Christian minister to repentance, and cause her to seek forgiveness.—M. C. S., Grinnell, Iowa, for the conversion of a son who was consecrated to the Lord at his birth, but has gone into the world and is indifferent to Christ.—M. A. L., Bloomfield, N. J., that God would change the heart of a beloved boy who is very stubborn.

For the Restoration of Health.

N. V., that God in his mercy would restore a dear mother who has long been a sufferer.—Subscriber, Jackson, Mich., for the recovery of a man who has partially lost his reason.—E. P. R., Altamont, Kan., that a dear sister who is suffering in mind and body may be restored by the Great Physician.—Believer, Lemon, Pa., for the recovery of a daughter who is critically ill.—Grandmother, Duck Lake, Mich., that her daughter's son, who has been ill for three months past, may be restored to health.—Constant Reader, Saco, Me., for the recovery of her husband whose mind is unbalanced.—Barrett Worker, Columbus, Ga., that a beloved daughter may be restored to health and usefulness.—Believer, Chelsea, Mass., that a dear friend may be saved from blindness and may recover the full use of his eyes, and that God would avert in her own case a dreaded disease.—Wife and Mother, Philadelphia, Pa., for the recovery of her husband from rheumatic trouble.—Believer, Nashville, Tenn., who acknowledges now the answer of many prayers in the past, asks prayer that a dreaded operation may not prove necessary and that Christ would give full restoration of health.—Reader, Damascus, Pa., on behalf of two friends, one of whom has lost the use of her limbs and the other is demented, that God would in mercy restore both.—M. Clinton, Ia., for the recovery of a dear father and a friend.—Praying Mother, S. Dak., for the recovery of a niece who is afflicted with a distressing disease.—J. B. F., Adrian, Mo., that God in his mercy would grant the restoration of reason to a beloved son who has gone insane through grief.—The following persons request prayers for their recovery from various diseases: Reader, Averett, Va.; Subscriber, Winona; Believer, Bucknell, Ind.; Believer, Remsen, Ia.; W. H. F., Atlanta, Ga.; A. L. R. D., Washington, D. C.

For Special Blessings.

Reader, Adrian, Mich., asks prayer that a young man separated from his family may soon be able to find employment and may be cheered in his despondency by assurance of God's compassion.—Reader, Fort Worth, Tex., that God would grant speedy relief from financial troubles and give grace to do and suffer his will.—A Sister, that a man in distress through inability to meet an obligation may be enabled to get the help he needs.—Subscriber, San Jacinto, Cal., that two persons who have fallen into grievous sin and brought reproach on the cause of Christ may be led to repentance and renounce their evil ways.—N. R. V., Haymond, Va., that a young married man may be able to secure employment suited to his capacity.—Suffering Wife, Ont., that her husband may have grace to control an unhappy temper and that his son may be delivered from the curse.—E. A. F., Wampum, Wis., that a Christian young man whose conduct has brought misery to his family and reproach on the name of Christ, may be led to know and do the right thing.—M. C. L., Mt. Vernon, O., that God would raise up friends for a cause which is sorely in need of funds and that the work of soul-saving begun in his strength may not be interrupted, but, cleared of debt, go on with increasing blessing through the winter.—Believer, Beach, Ga., for grace to trust God implicitly and that when work fails a new position may open.—Reader, Lansing, Mich., who is in sore trouble and fears that her husband is losing his reason, asks prayer for deliverance and that the means may be provided for the family need.—H. E. L. C., for the funds so urgently needed for necessary food and clothing.

Persons desiring the prayers of the Converts' Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission should address their letters to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 91-102 Bible House, New York.

Your Cough,

like a dog's bark, is a sign that there is something foreign around which shouldn't be there. You can quiet the noise, but the danger may be there just the same. SCOTT'S EMULSION of Cod-liver Oil is not a cough specific; it does not merely allay the symptoms but it does give such strength to the body that it is able to throw off the disease.

You know the old proverb of "the ounce of prevention?" Don't neglect your cough. A book which will tell you more on the subject sent free on request.

Your druggist keeps Scott's Emulsion of Cod liver Oil. Put up in 50 cts. and $1.00 sizes.

THE HEART'S GIFT.

HERE is my heart—my heart so hard before, Now by thy grace made meet; Yet bruised and wearied, it can only pour Its anguish at thy feet; It groans beneath the weight of sin, It sighs salvation's joys to win. My mourning heart!

Here is my heart!—in Christ its longings end, Near to his cross it draws; It says, "Thou art my portion, O my friend! Thy blood my ransom was." And in the Saviour it has found What blessedness and peace abound. My trusting heart!

Here is my heart!—ah, Holy Spirit, come, Its nature to renew, And consecrate it wholly as thy home, A temple fair and true. Teach it to love and serve thee more, To fear thee, trust thee, and adore. My cleansed heart!

HOW many words do you think you can correctly spell with the letters in the word OPPORTUNITIES? Using each letter as desired, but not more times than it appears in Opportunities. Proper nouns, obsolete and foreign words not allowed. Words spelled alike but having different meanings, count as one word. Work it out as follows: Poor, Tim, This, Nut, Run, Runs, etc.

Our Offer.—We will pay $100 for the largest list, $50 for the second largest, $25 for the third, $10 each for the next five, $5 each for the next ten, and $1 each for the next twenty-five. That is to say we will divide among forty-three contestants the aggregate sum of $300, according to merit. Don't you think you could be one of the forty-three? TRY IT.

Our Purpose.—The above rewards for mental effort are given free and without consideration for the purpose of attracting attention to MODELS, by May Mantion, the most popular up-to-date Fashion Magazine in the world. Its 36 pages, replete with beautiful illustrations of the latest styles in ladies' dresses and children's garments, make it a real necessity in every household; the Designs and Fashion Hints, being by May Mantion, render it invaluable as an absolutely reliable Fashion Guide.

Our Conditions.—You must send with your list of words 25 cents (stamps or silver) for a Three Months' Trial Subscription to Models.

Our Extra Inducement.—Every person sending 25 cents and a list of 15 words or more, will, in addition to three months' subscription, receive by return mail a pattern of this ladies' bebe waist with mushroom sleeves, No. 659 (illustrated above), in any size from 22 to 40 inches bust measurement.

Our Aim.—The present monthly circulation of Models exceeds 50,000. We aim to make it 100,000. This contest will close February 15th next so the names of successful spellers may be published in the following issue of Models, but SEND IN YOUR LIST AT ONCE. HEROIC PERSONALITIES

BY REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

Kindling the Gospel Fire In a Northern Wigwam.

ONE of the most magnetic men it has ever been my privilege to converse with, is the Rev. Egerton Ryerson Young, the famous Missionary to the Indians of British Columbia. Mr. Young is one of those untless souls who would have won success and fame in almost any department

Tired out and sad at heart, the Missionary sat down in quiet communion and breathed up a prayer for guidance and help in this sore perplexity. In his extremity the needed assistance came so consciously that he almost exulted in the assurance of coming victory. Springing up, he shouted out, "I know where all your children are, who are not among the living! I know, yes, I do most certainly where all the children are whom death has taken in his cold grasp from among us, the children of the good and of the bad, of the whites and of the Indians, I know where all the children are."

Great indeed was the excitement among them. Some of them had their faces well shrouded in their blankets as they sat like upright mummies in the crowded wigwam. But when he uttered these words, they quickly uncovered their faces and manifested the most intense interest. Seeing that he had at length got their attention, he went on: "Yes, I know where all the children are. They have gone from your camp-fires and wigwams. The hammocks are empty and the little bows and arrows lie idle. Many of your hearts are sad, as you mourn for these little ones whose voices you hear not, and who come not at your call. I am so glad that the Great Spirit gives me authority to tell you that you may meet your children again, and be happy with them forever. But you must listen to his words which I bring to you from his great Book, and give him your hearts, and love and serve him. There is only one way to that beautiful land, where Jesus, the Son of the Great Spirit, has gone, and into which he takes all the children who have died; and now that you have heard his message, and seen his Book you, too, must come this way if you would be happy and there enter in."

While he was thus speaking, a big, stalwart Indian from the other side of the tent sprang up, and rushed toward him. Beating on his breast, he said, "Missionary, my heart is empty, and I mourn much for none of my children are left among the living; very lonely is my wigwam. I long to see my children again and to clasp them in my arms. Tell me, Missionary, what must I do to please the Great Spirit, that I may get to that beautiful land, that I may meet my children again?" Then he sank upon the ground at Mr. Young's feet, his eyes overflowing with tears, and was quickly joined by others, who, like him, were broken down with grief, and were anxious now for religious instruction.

To the blessed Book they went, and after reading what Jesus had said about little children, and giving them some glimpses of his great love for them, Mr. Young told them "the old, old story," as simply and lovingly as he could. There was no more scoffing or indifference. It was the beginning of a blessed work which resulted in the winning of nearly the entire tribe to a happy experience of the saving love of Christ.

Do You Suffer from Asthma?

If you do, you will be interested in knowing that the Kola Plant, a new botanic discovery found on the Congo River, West Africa, is pronounced an assured cure for the disease. Most marvelous cures are wrought by this new plant, when all other remedies fail. Rev. G. Ellsworth Stump, Pastor of the Congregational Church, Newell, Iowa, writes that the Kola Plant cured him of severe Asthma of twenty years' standing; Alfred C. Lewis, Editor of the Farmer's Magazine, of Washington, D. C., testifies that it cured him when he could not lie down at night without fear of choking, and many others give similar testimony. It is really a most wonderful discovery. To prove to you beyond doubt its wonderful curative power, the Kola Importing Company, No. 1164 Broadway, New York, will send a large case of the Kola Compound free by mail to every reader of The Christian Herald who suffers from any form of Asthma. They only ask in return that when cured yourself you will tell your neighbors about it. This is very fair, and you should surely try it, as it costs you nothing.

Keep your blood pure and healthy and you will not have rheumatism. Hood's Sarsaparilla gives the blood vitality and richness, and tones the whole body. Give it a trial now.

"BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES" are a simple and convenient remedy for Bronchial Affections and Coughs. Carry them in your pocket.

It Stands Alone!

As the snow-capped summit of an isolated mountain peak, all a-glitter with the slanting sunshine, compels the gaze of the dweller in the valley, so Quaker Oats does the exalted pre-eminence of health challenge the intelligence of the whole of Christendom. There it stands! over-top-ping, overshadowing all competition, with its wide extended base of genuine merit resting upon the popular approval of a whole world, and its cloud-reaching superiority reflecting the crowning glory of honor and success. Quaker Oats might well serve as the text from which to preach a sermon on "The Reward of Real Merit," for only by reason of its inherent excellence has it become "The Architect of the Breakfast Table."

It has been said that, "The man who succeeds in making two blades of grass grow where only one grew before, is a public benefactor." How much greater the achievement of making a dime equal to a dollar in purchasing power! Quaker Oats has done this, placing within the grasp of the wealthy and poor alike, the greatest health food and dietary delicacy. In the mansions of the rich, in the cottages of the poor, in princes' palaces and in dingy tenements alike has Quaker Oats become a household word. To the epicure it is a dainty morsel to tempt the appetite, to the dyspeptic a solace, and to the poor man a pleasant offering, offering the most healthful and nutritious diet. Small wonder then, that Quaker Oats has met with the universal indorsement of intelligence, and that to-day it stands alone! the recognized standard of excellence, a synonym for a good breakfast, the people's choice.

SAPOLIO

The Plagues of Egypt.

REMARKABLE change of tactics has been observed recently in the assaults of the enemies of the Bible on the Book. Formerly we used to be gravely assured that the miracles recorded there, could never have taken place—that these wonders were impossible. But electricity, chemistry, and the sciences have made gigantic strides in this generation and have proved to these wise men that there are phenomena in nature not dreamed of in their philosophy. They have learned the lesson, and have adroitly changed their point of assault. These wonders which were formerly declared to be impossible, they now admit may have occurred, but they were not supernatural, but the result of natural laws and forces. The object of these assaults is to get rid of the supernatural, but the Christian believer will see in the argument only a proof that when God determines to effect a purpose, he has in nature an abundance of forces which he can use. The scientists, if they are right, have not disproved the miracle, but have merely indicated the means by which it was worked.

A German physician, resident at Cairo, writing to the Leipziger Christliche Welt, makes some interesting observations. His personal experiences and investigations led him to the conclusion that the story of the ten plagues of Egypt, related in the Pentateuch, was in effect a remarkable demonstration of the power of the Almighty in combining natural forces and elements to accomplish certain purposes. Thus the miraculous turning of the river into "blood" might be accounted for by the sand storms which about November blow from the Libyan Desert, and which have been known at times to contain minute red infusoria, which, falling into the water, turn it a blood color. Whether this in itself causes the fish to die, is not known, but the sinking of the river causes about this time an immense mortality amongst the fish, which, left by the retreating waters, die, and cause the land "to stink." At this season, also, frogs and toads are developed in the standing water, and these, as the water retires, cover the land. Nature by miraculous impulse might be made to multiply these into millions. This visitation is often accompanied by swarms of lice, ants, snakes and snails, which might be similarly augmented. In December the condition of the ground left by the retreating waters is favorable to the development of epidemics amongst the cattle. As to the plague of "blains," the Upper Nile is the home of this disease, which in its worst form breaks out as black boils—a striking fact when the Scripture story is remembered. The plague of locusts would follow in the early spring, generally in March. In April comes often the south wind, called the "Chamsin," which brings with it a fine sand which often seems to blot out the sun and to cause a temporary darkness. This miraculously produced, intensified and continued, would excite a general panic. The German writer concludes that the year of the plague must have been a phenomenal one, in which the tremendous natural agencies employed in so strange and miraculous a manner, were calculated to strike both Egyptians and Israelites, and impress them with a sense of divine interposition.

THE HOUSE I LIVE IN.

THE house I live in has grown old,
Some parts of it are in decay,
The thatch upon the roof, once black,
Is nearly now all turned to gray.
Light through the window-panes is dim,
So that I cannot clearly see;
Two new ones I have now outside,
Have been a wondrous help to me.
The grinders from the kitchen gone,
I miss their presence every day,
Some others that I once put in
Are of poor service anyway.
The unseen, noiseless engine's beat,
That has not ceased for sixty years,
Is still at work, but slower now
Its action to my sense appears;
And the warm liquid that it sends
Through the old house to heat its walls
Grows cold as round about the place
Black winter's withering snow-flake falls.
Though I have had the house repaired,
Sometimes outside, and oft within,
Yet as the silent years roll on,
I feel the walls are growing thin.
'Twill grieve me much to leave the place,
Each nook and corner I revere,
Sweet, joyous days I've spent therein
Through many a bright, glad, golden year;
To me its walls are sacred, too,
Within them I have suffered long.
"But God has been my strength and stay,"
In weakness he has made me strong.
And he has come and "supped with me,"
And soothed my sorrow, eased my pain,
And made the place like "Bethany's home,"
Bright with restored life again.
Soon this old house will be dissolved,
Not lost, but only laid away,
And I shall then be taken home
In Father's inner rooms to stay,
Till the whole family shall meet,
From every land beneath the sky,
And this frail house be built anew,
For me once more to occupy;
A tenant in a changeless home,
No windows dim, and no decay,
No sorrow, sickness, and no death,
"For former things have passed away."
West Newton, Mass. W. I. N.

Three Answered Prayers.

The following was read at the Converts' Prayer-meeting of the Bowery Mission, on December 6: "I desire most humbly and reverently and with a most abject consciousness of my worthiness, to record my own experience in relation to the Bowery Mission. In September of last year, I was in great anxiety about a family trouble which seemed to threaten utter ruin. It appeared to be inevitable—no way of avoiding it. I sent a request for prayer to the Bowery Mission. It was answered in a marvelous way, and the trouble was averted. A new and entirely different trial was harassing a family, and that also appeared to be a cross that must be endured; but I sent a request asking for its removal. The prayer was heard and it was removed. Last week I sent a third request. It was that the way might be opened for a friend in urgent need of an opportunity to earn an honest livelihood. Within three days of your prayers being offered, the answer came. I am informed that my friend is now in the way of securing a good income. I feel as Peter did when he said, 'Depart from me for I am a sinful man, O Lord'; but I trust that he will never leave me, and that I may be changed by his loving presence with me, and enabled to renounce all my sins and walk humbly with my God. I am awed by this experience of the nearness of God."

Used in Modern Flats

the new SINGER AUTOMATIC SEWING MACHINE becomes especially desirable because of its noiselessness and its compact form. Having neither shuttle nor bobbin, it is only necessary to thread the needle and it is ready to sew. Its simple mechanism is truly automatic, and a child can use it effectively. With all the advantages claimed for any chain-stitch machine,

The Singer Automatic has the following points of preference. They can easily be demonstrated by comparison:—

- 1st.—It is absolutely the lightest-running, because it has the fewest parts, these being of latest design, perfectly constructed and faultlessly finished.
- 2d.—It is more easily threaded, its parts are better protected from dust, it has more room under the arm, and is capable of a greater range of work.
- 3d.—The Broad treadle better promotes the health and comfort of the operator, because it is lower, and the position of the feet can be changed at will. The band-wheel shaft turns on cone bearings, thereby securing greater steadiness and ease of motion.

These advantages especially commend THE SILENT SINGER to the favor of the apartment dweller.

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD."

BEARING His Evangel,
Near, and far away,
To the distant millions,
As the light of day;
Bringing joy and gladness
To many a weary heart,
In the lonely mountain
And the crowded mart.
Words of timely warning
To the high or low,
Kindly words, and cheering
The cross of Christ to show;
Bearing always, ever,
"The mark of Christ" our Lord,
In the open forehead,
By His kingly word.

Onward "Christian Herald"!
Through the distant years,
Bearing gospels ever,
Good news that banish tears;
News of Christ the Saviour,
For sinners ever slain;
News of highest wisdom
That man may ever gain.

A Judge Upholds the Sabbath.

In the Supreme Court of New York, a few days ago, a decision was rendered by Justice Pryor, which is attracting more than usual attention. A Hebrew society had applied for incorporation, and in its application, among other matters, that it was proposed to hold its annual meetings on the second Sunday in January each year. Justice Pryor refused the certificate of incorporation, and in his decision made use of the following language with respect to the observance of the Christian Sabbath by the American people:

"It (the society in question) is not a religious corporation, and its annual meetings are for the performance of precisely such secular business as is transacted by other civil corporations. The question is not whether such meetings on Sunday are illegal, but whether they should be approved by a Justice of the Supreme Court. A thing may be lawful and yet not laudable. In the State of New York the Sabbath exists as a day of rest by the common law, and without the necessity of legislative action to establish it, and may be protected from desecration by such laws as the Legislature, in its wisdom, may deem necessary to secure to the community the privilege of undisturbed worship and to the day itself that outward respect and observance which may be deemed essential to the peace and good order of society, and to preserve religion and its ordinances from open reviling and contempt." (Lindenmuller vs. The People, 33 Barb., 548.) "The Christian Sabbath is one of the civil institutions of the State, and the Legislature, for the purpose of promoting the moral and physical well-being of the people and the peace, quiet and good order of society, has authority to regulate its observance and prevent its desecration." (People vs. Moses, 140 N. Y., 215.) This sanctity of the Christian Sabbath is sanctioned and secured by repeated acts of legislation extending from the colonial period to the present year, and as well by the impressive deliverances of the Court of Appeals. As Justice of the Supreme Court I may not approve that which the immemorial and uniform policy of the State condemns.

"Although not explicitly stated, it is nevertheless an inference, from the face of the certificate before me, that the members of the proposed corporation are of a race and religion by which not the first but the seventh day of the week is set apart for religious observance. The fact might be of decisive importance were a desecration of their holy day contemplated; but the act intended is an aggression upon the Christian Sabbath. The law, which scrupulously protects them in the observance of their ceremonial, gives them no license, and I am sure they have no desire to affront the religious susceptibilities of others. True, to a prosecution for work or labor on the first day of the week, the defendant may plead that 'he uniformly keeps another day of the week as holy time and does not labor on that day, and that the labor complained of was done in such manner as not to interrupt or disturb other persons in observing the first day of the week as holy time' (Penal Code, Section 264); but otherwise the legislation of the State against profanation of the Christian Sabbath is operative and imperative upon all classes of the community. Because the holding of corporate meetings on Sunday is contrary to the public policy of the State, if not to the letter of its law, I decline to approve its certificate."

As might have been expected, the decision has evoked much criticism, and especially from those who are not in sympathy with the effort among Christian people everywhere to preserve the integrity of the American Sabbath. It was certainly courageous to proceed from the Supreme bench in these days of latitude in religious matters, but it was in harmony with the spirit of the Sunday laws now in force in the State of New York.

The Orphans of Armenia.

There Are 50,000 Whose Parents Were Martyrs—A Pitiful Sequel to the Massacres.

MISSIONARY letters from Armenia give a more hopeful view of the situation than at any time within the last six months. At Arabkir, the work of rebuilding the ruined homes is progressing, and the strain on the Relief Committee is not so severe as it was. At Egin, the prospects are that the Christians will leave the place and seek homes elsewhere. Large numbers are still receiving aid at both cities. Friends in England are forwarding looms to aid the people with employment. At Malatia, the Armenians are rebuilding, being aided by the Relief Committees. Nearly 3,000 are still receiving aid.

The great problem, next to the meeting of immediate wants, is the orphans. It is estimated that there are over 50,000 children whose parents perished under Moslem attack in the massacres or died of privation. To care for this army of helpless little ones will be a task for the whole Christian world. Malatia has 1833 orphans, Arabkir 1943, Egin 1,000. Erzurum 1,500, and the other cities in proportion.

In a letter from Harpoot, it is stated that in the villages of Tulcka, Habab, and Socrat, there have been recent deaths from hunger. Relief work continues at all the stations.

The Beautiful Bosphorus.

Few bodies of water are more picturesque than the Bosphorus, whose banks furnish one of the grandest panoramas in the world. At its back rise the green wooded hills, and the front is lined with pleasant villas and palaces—white or yellow, built in Turkish fashion—with in-

Strange New Shrub that Cures Kidney and Bladder Diseases, Rheumatism, etc. Free.

We have previously described the new botanic discovery, Alkavis, which proves a specific cure for diseases caused by Uric acid in the blood, or disorder of the Kidneys or urinary organs. It is now stated that Alkavis is a product of the well known Kava-Kava Shrub, and is a specific cure for these diseases just as quinine is for malaria. Hon. R. C. Wood, of Lowell, Ind., writes that in four weeks Alkavis cured him of Kidney and bladder disease of ten year's standing, and Rev Thomas M. Owen, of West Pawlet, Vt., gives similar testimony. Many ladies also testify to its wonderful curative powers in disorders peculiar to womanhood. The only importers of Alkavis so far are the Church Kidney Cure Co., of 418 Fourth Avenue, New York, and they are so anxious to prove its value that for the sake of introduction they will send a free treatment of Alkavis prepaid by mail to every reader of The Christian Herald who is a sufferer from any form of Kidney or Bladder disorder, Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Gravel, Pain in Back, Female Complaints, or other affliction due to improper action of the Kidneys or Urinary Organs. We advise all Sufferers to send their names and address to the company, and receive the Alkavis free. It is sent to you entirely free, to prove its wonderful curative power numerable windows everywhere. There must be great wealth to build and support such places. Everywhere there is a great appearance of religion. Go into a mosque any hour you will and you will see a priest or layman sitting in a quiet corner, fenced with a wooden rail, cross-legged, repeating the Koran. On our way back we pass that favorite resort of the Turkish holiday-makers—the Valley of Sweet Waters—and have a good view of the hospital at Scutari—built by Florence Nightingale and now utilized as barracks—and of the monuments in front of the cemetery in memory of the officers and soldiers who died during the Crimean War

The Song of the Drunkards.

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., } "I was the song of the on the Text: Ps. 69: 12: } drunkards."

WHIO said that? Was it David or was it Christ? It was both. These Messianic Psalms are like a telescope. Pull the instrument to a certain range, and it shows you an object near by. Pull it to another range, and it will show you objects far away. David and Christ were both, each in his own time, the song of the drunkards. Holiness of doctrine and life always did excite wicked merriment. Although David had fully reformed and written a psalmody in which all subsequent ages have sobbed out their penitence, his enemies preferred to fetch up his old career, and put into metric measures sins long before forgiven. Christ, who committed no sin, was still more the subject of unholy song, because the better one is, the more iniquity hates him. Of the best being whose voice ever moved the air or whose foot ever touched the earth it might be said:

The byword of the passing throng,
The ruler's scoff, the drunkard's song.

The earth fitted up for the human race, in congratulation the morning stars sang a song. The Israelitish army safe on the bank of the Red Sea and the Egyptians clear under the returned water, Moses sang a song. One of the most important parts of this great old Book is Solomon's song. At the birth of our Lord the Virgin Mary and old Simeon and angelic prima donnas in hovering clouds sang a song. What enrichment has been given to the world's literature and enjoyment by the ballads, the canticles, the discants, the ditties, the roundelays, the epics, the lyrics, the dithyrambs. But my text calls attention to a style of song that I think has never been discoursed upon. You sometimes hear this style of music when passing a saloon, or a residence in which dissipation is ascendant, or after you have retired at night you hear it coming out of the street from those who, having tarried long at their cups, are on their way home—the ballad of the inebriate, the serenade of the alcoholized, or what my text calls the Song of the Drunkards.

For practical and saving and warning and Christian purposes I will announce to you the characteristics of that wellknown cadence mentioned in my text. First I remark that the Song of the Drunkards is an old song. Much of the music of the world and of the church is old music. First came the music of percussion, the clapping cymbal, which was suggested by a hammer on an anvil, and then the sighing of the wind across the reeds suggested the flute, and then the strained sinews of the tortoise across its shell suggested the harp. But far back of that, and nearly back as far as the moral collapse of our first parentage is the Song of the Drunkards. That tune was sung at least four thousand two hundred and forty three years ago, when, the deluge past, Noah came out of the ark, and as if disgusted with too much prevalence of water, he took to strong drink and staggered forth for all ages the first known drunkard. He sounded the first note of the old music of inebriety. An Arab author of A. D. 1310, wrote: "Noah, being come out of the ark, ordered each of his sons to build a house. Afterwards they were occupied in sowing and in planting trees, the pippins and fruits of which they had found in the ark,

The vine alone was wanting, and they could not discover it. Gabriel then informed them that the devil had desired it, and indeed had some right to it. Hereupon Noah summoned him to appear in the field, and said to him: 'O accursed! Why hast thou carried away the vine from me?' 'Because,' replied the devil, 'it belonged to me.' 'Shall I part it for you?' said Gabriel. 'I consent,' said Noah, 'and will leave him a fourth.' 'That is not sufficient for him,' said Gabriel. 'Well, I will take half,' replied Noah, 'and he shall take the other.' 'That is not sufficient yet,' responded Gabriel. 'He must have two-thirds and thou one, and when thy wine shall have boiled on the fire until two-thirds are gone, the remainder shall be assigned for thy use.' A fable that illustrates how the vine has been misappropriated.

Benhadad and thirty-two allied kings, rioting in a pavilion, took up the same bacchanal. Nabal was rendering that drunkards' song when his wife, beautiful Abigail, came back from her expedition to save her husband. Herod was singing that song when the daughter of Herodias wheeled in the dance before him. Beishazzar and a thousand lords renewed that song the night the handwriting came out on the plastering of the wall and the tramp of the besieging host was heard on the palace stairs. Ahasuerus sang that song when, after seven days of carousal, he ordered Vashti to come into the presence of the roaring guests without her veil on—a January storm trying to command a June morning. Oh, yes! The song of the drunkards is an old song. King Cyrus boasted that he could drink more wine than his brother. Drunkenness was so rife among the Lacedaemonians that Lycurgus had all the vines of the vineyards destroyed. Paul excoriates the Corinthians for turning the communion of the Lord's Supper at church into a carousal. Isaiah mentions the drunkards of Ephraim. So much were the Athenians given to wassail that a law was passed giving a man double punishment for crime while intoxicated, the first punishment for the crime, and the other for the intoxication. It was a staccato passage in that song when Alexander the Great arose from a banquet and struck a spear through the heart of Clitus while putting up the curtains, and horrified at what was done, withdrew the sword from the dead body and attempted to take his own life. In the time of Oliver Cromwell the evil was so great that offenders were compelled to wear what was called "the drunkard's cloak," namely, a barrel with one end of it knocked out and a hole in the opposite end, the arms thrust through holes at the sides of the barrel. Samuel Johnson made merry of his own inebriety. Oh, this old song! All the centuries have joined in. Among the first songs ever sung was the Song of the Drunkards.

Again, this Song of the Drunkards is an expensive song. The Sonntags and the Parepa Rosas and Nilssons and the other renderers of elevated and divine solos received their thousands of dollars per night in coliseums and academies of music. Some of the people of small means almost pauperized themselves that they might sit a few evenings under the enchantment of those angels of sweet sounds. I paid seven dollars to hear Jenny Lind sing when it was not very easy to afford the seven dollars. Very expensive is such music, but the costliest song on earth is the drunkard's song. It costs ruin of body. It costs ruin of mind. It costs ruin of soul. Go right down among the residential streets of any city and you can find once beautiful and luxurious homesteads that were expended in this destructive music. The lights have gone out in the drawing-room, the pianos have ceased the pulsation of their keys, the wardrobe has lost its last article of appropriate attire. The Belshazzarean feast has left nothing but the broken pieces of the crushed chalices. There it stands, the ghastliest thing on earth, the remnant of a drunkard's home. The costliest thing on earth is sin. The most expensive of all music is the Song of the Drunkards. It is the highest tariff of nations—not a protective tariff, but a tariff of doom, a tariff of woe, a tariff of death. This evil whets the knives of the assassins, cuts the most of the wounds of the hospital, makes necessary most of the almshouses, causes the most of the ravings of the insane asylum, and puts up most of the iron bars of the penitentiaries. It has its hand to-day on the throat of the American Republic. It is the taskmaster of nations, and the human race crouches under its anathema. The Song of the Drunkards has for its accompaniment the clank of chains, the chattering teeth of poverty, the rattle of executioner's scaffold, the creaking door of the deserted home, the crash of shipwrecks, and the groan of empires. The two billion twenty million dollars which rum costs this country in a year, in the destruction of grain and sugar, and the supporting of the paupers and the invalids and the criminals which strong drink causes, is only a small part of what is paid for this expensive Song of the Drunkards.

Again, this Song of the Drunkards is a multitudinous song—not a solo, not a duet, not a quartette, not a sextette; but millions on millions are this hour singing it. Do not think that alcoholism has this field all to itself. It has powerful rivals in the intoxicants of other nations: hasheesh, and arrack, and pulque, and opium, and quavo, and mastic, and wedro. Every nation, barbaric as well as civilized, has its pet intoxicant. This Song of the Drunkards is rendered in Chinese, Hindoo, Arabian, Assyrian, Persian, Mexican—yea, all the languages. All zones join it. No continent would be large enough for the choir gallery if all those who have this libretto in their hands should stand side by side to chant the international chorus. Other throngs are just learning the eight notes of this deathful music which is already mastered by the orchestras in full voice under the batons in full swing. All the musicians assembled at Dusseldorf, or Berlin, or Boston Peace Jubilee, rendering symphonies, requiems, or grand marches of Mendelssohn or Wagner or Chopin or Handel, were insignificant in numbers as compared with the innumerable throngs, host beside host, gallery above gallery, who are now pouring forth the Song of the Drunkards.

Years ago, standing before a bulletin board in New York on the night of a Presidential election day, as the news came in and the choice of the American people was finally announced, there were people in the streets who sang roistering and frivolous songs; but in the street one man, in deep, strong, resonant voice, started, to the tune of "Old Hundred," "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow," and soon all up and down the street the voices joined in the Doxology. May God speed the day when the song of rescue and salvation shall drown with an overwhelming surge this mighty Song of the Drunkards!

Again, the Song of the Drunkards is a suggestive song. You hear a nursery refrain, and right away you think of your childhood home, and brothers and sisters with whom you played, and mother, long since gone to rest. You hear a national air, and you think of the encampment of 1863, and the still night on the river bank and the camp-fires that shook their reflections up and down the faces of the regiment. You hear an old church tune, and you are reminded of the revival scene amid which you were brought to God. Nothing so brings up associations as a song sung or played upon instrument, and the Drunkards' Song is full of suggestion. As you hear it on the street—quite late some night, you begin to say to yourself, "I wonder if he has a mother? Is his wife waiting for him? Will his children be frightened when he enters the fro-door and staggers, whooping, up the stairs? What chance is there for that young man started so early on the down grade? In what business will he succeed? How long before that man will run through his property? I wonder how he got so far astray? Can any influence be wielded to fetch him back? He must have got into bad company who led him off." So you soliloquize and guess about this man whose voice you hear on the street under the starlight.

Notice that the second noun of my text is in the plural. Not "Drunkard," but "Drunkards." It would be dull work to sing that song solitary and alone. It is generally a chorus. They are in groups. On that downward way there must be companionship. Here and there is a man so mean as always to drink alone, but generous men, big-hearted men, drinking at bar or in restaurant or in club-house, feel mortified to take the beverage unaccompanied. There must be some one with whom to click the rim of the glasses, some one's health to propose, some sentiment to toast. There must be two, and still better if four, and still better if six, to give zest to the Song of the Drunkards. Those who have gone down could mention the name of at least one who helped them down. Generally it is some one who was a little higher up in social life or in financial resources. Our friend felt flattered to have an invitation from one of superior name. Each one drank not only when he felt like it, but when the other felt like it. Neither wanted to seem lacking in sociality when he was invited. So a hundred thousand men every year are treated into hell. Together are they manacled of evil habit, together they travel toward their doom, together they make merry over the cowardice or puritanical sentiment of those who never indulge, together they join their voices in the Song of the Drunkards. If the one proposes to stop, the other will not let him stop. When men are getting down themselves they do not want their associates to turn back. Those who turn back will be the scoff and caricature of those who keep on, and there will be conspiracy to bring them back to their old places and their old environment, and so have them renew the Song of the Drunkards. There was a tragedy in New York September, 1845. A man of marvellous natural gifts, had, after arriving from his home in England, fallen into dissipated habits, and being a fine singer as well as impersonator, entertained many a bar room group at Newburyport, Boston, and New York; but by the grace of God and the kindness of one Joel Stratton, had been rescued and took the platform for temperance, and moved vast audiences to ward a better life. "Destroy him!" said some of his old associates, and they set a trap for his feet. "How do you do, Mr. Gough?" said some one on the street in New York. He pretended to be an old acquaintance, and said, "I suppose you are so pious now and have got to be so proud that you will not drink a glass of soda water with an old shipmate." "Oh, yes," said Mr. Gough, "I will drink a glass of soda water with anybody. I will drink glass with you." They went down Chatham street to Chatham street, and into place where "Best Soda" was announced at the door. After some delay there was handed to him a glass of soda water said to be flavored with raspberry, but alas! it was rum, that flew to his brain and set him through the street an insane man, an Weeks passed before he came to himself and implored the pardon of the Christian church that he had joined, and resumed his wondrous career for God and righteousness. But all the grogshops and places of dissipation rang with merriment at the temporary downfall. All the grogshops and wine-cellars of America took up with new voice and new gusto and new enthusiasm and new diabolism the Song of the Drunkards.

There looms up in my memory one of the best and noblest friends I ever had. He had been for thirty years a consistent member of the church. I knew not that at about twenty-one years of age he had followed the sea and habits of inebriacy had been fixed upon him. But converted to God he began a new life. Yet it was a thirty years' war against the old appetite; but about this struggle I knew nothing until he was dead. While absent during my summer vacation I received a telegram announcing his death and asking me to come and officiate at his obsequies. I arrived at the moment the service was to begin, and had not much time to make inquiries about his last hours. In my remarks, without any limitations, I extolled his virtues while living and spoke of the heavenly raptures into which he had entered. Afterward I found that he had died of delirium tremens in the hospital, because he was so violent he could not be efficiently restrained in his beautiful home. He had been seized in the street with violent pains of body, and went into an apothecary store to get medical relief. Something there given him set on fire his old appetite for strong drink, and utterly irresponsible, he went from liquor store to liquor store, until, a raging maniac, the officers of the law bound him and took him to the hospital, where he died. Some time after I said to the doctor in the hospital, "Of what did he die?" and he answered was, "Congestion of the brain." I said, "Doctor, I want to know the bottom facts, for I was his pastor and he was one of the best friends I ever had. Was it delirium tremens?" and the doctor responded "Yes." Did I regret that at his obsequies I had extolled his virtues and spoken of the heavenly joys upon which he had entered? No. I do not think that my friend was any more responsible for the mode of his taking off than a typhoid fever patient in delirium is responsible for leaping out of the fourth-story window. But while we were heart-broken about his going away, I think that in the saloons, to those who heard of his membership of the Church and the tragedy of his departure, he became, as did he David and the Christ of my text, the Song of the Drunkards.

Again, the Song of the Drunkards is easily learned. Through what long and difficult drill one must go to succeed as an elevated and inspiring singer. Emma Abbott, among the most eminent cantatrices that ever enchanted academies of music, told me on ocean ship's deck, in answer to my question, "Whither are you bound?" "I am going to Berlin and Paris to study music." "What!" I said, "after all your world-renowned successes in music, going to study?" Then she told me through what hardships, through what self-denials, through what almost killing fatigues she had gone in order to be a singer, and that when, in her earlier days, a great teacher of music had told her there were certain notes she could never reach, she said, "I will reach them," and through doing nothing else but practice for five years she did reach them. Oh, how many heroes and heroines of musical achievement! There are songs which are easy to hear but most difficult to render. When Handel, with a new oratorio, entered a room where a group of musicians had assembled, and said, "Gentlemen, you all read music?" they said, "Yes, we play in church." "Very well," said the great composer, "play this." But the performance was so poorly done Handel stopped his ears and said, "You play in church! Very well; for we read the Lord is long suffering, of great kindness, and forgiving of iniquity, transgression and sin. But you shall not play for me." Pure music, whether fingered on instrument or trilled from human lips, is most difficult. But one of the easiest songs to learn is the Song of the Drunkards. Anybody can learn it. In a little while you can touch the highest note of conviviality or the lowest note of besottedness. Begin moderately, a sip here and a sip there. Begin with claret, go on with ale, and wind up with Cognac. First take the stimulant at a wedding, then take it at meals, then take it between meals, then all the time keep your pulse under its stealthy touch. In six months the dullest scholar in this apolynomic music may become an expert. First it will be sounded in a hiccup. After awhile it will be heard in a silly ha! ha! Further on it will become a wild whoop. Then it will enable you to run up and down the five lines of the musical scale infernal. Then you will have mastered it—the Song of the Drunkards.

The most skilful way is to adopt the modern theory and give the intoxicant to your children, saying to yourself, "They will in after life meet the intoxicants everywhere, and they must get used to seeing scripture of a doctor for aids to digestion or breaking up of infirmities, and close life by rendering the Song of the Drunkards so well that all Pandemonium will encore the performance and want it again and again.

Furthermore, the last characteristic of the Drunkards' Song is so tremendous that I can hardly bring myself to mention it. The Drunkards' Song is a continuous song. Once start that tune, and you keep it up. You have known a hundred men destroyed of strong drink. You cannot mention five who got fully started on that road and stopped. The grace of God can do anything, but it does not do everything. Religion saves some. Temperance societies save some. The Bowery Mission saves some. The Central Mission saves some. But one hundred thousand who are annually slain by strong drink are not saved at all. I have been at a concert which went on for two hours and a half, and many people got up and left because it was too long; but 95 per cent. of those who are singing the Drunkards' Song will to the last breath of their lungs and the last beat of their hearts keep on rendering it, and the galleries of earth and heaven and hell will stay filled with the astounded spectators. It is such a continuous and prolonged song that one feels like making the prayer which a reformed inebriate once made: "Almighty God! If it be thy will that man should suffer, up in time to swear that they, too, heard the clock strike thirteen that same midnight, and so the man's life was spared. My hearer, if you go on and thoroughly learn the Drunkards' Song, perhaps in the deep midnight of your soul there may sound something that will yet effect your moral and eternal rescue: But it is a risky "perhaps." It is exceptional. Go ahead on that wrong road and the clock will more probably strike the twelve that closes your day of opportunity, than that it will strike thirteen, the sound of your deliverance.

A few Sabbaths ago, on the steps of this church, a man whom I had known in others years confronted me. At the first glance, I saw that he was in the fifth and last act of the tragedy of intemperance. Splendid even in his ruin. I had seen that craft when it ploughed the waters, all sails set and running by true compass; wife, and children, and friends on board, himself commanding in a voyage that he expected would be glorious, putting into prosperous harbors of earth and at last putting into the harbor of heaven. But now a wreck, towed along by low appetites, that ever and anon run him into the breakers,—a wreck of body, a wreck of mind, a wreck of soul. "Where is your wife?" "I do not know." "Where are your children?" "I do not know." "Where is your God?" "I do not know." That man is coming to the last verse of that long cantata, that protracted threnody, that terrific Song of the Drunkards.

But if these words should come, —for you know the largest audience I reach I never see at all,—I say if these words should come, though at the ends of the earth, to any fallen man, let me say to him: Be the exception to the general rule, and turn and live, while I recall to you a scene in England, where some one said to an inebriate, as he was going out of church where there was a great awakening, "Why don't you sign the pledge?" He answered, "I have signed it twenty times, and will never sign it again." "Why, then," said the gentleman talking to him, "don't you go up and kneel at that altar, amid those other penitents?" He took the advice and went and knelt. After awhile a little girl, in rags and soaked with the rain, looked in the church door, and some one said, "What are you doing here, little girl?" She said, "Please, sir; I heard as my father is here. Why, that is my father up there, kneeling now." She went up and put her arms around her father's neck, and said, "Father, what are you doing here?" and he said, "I am asking God to forgive me." Said she, "If he forgives you will we be happy again?" "Yes, my dear." "Will we have enough to eat again?" "Yes, my dear." "And will you never strike us again?" "No, my child." "Wait here," said she, "till I go and call mother." And soon the child came with the mother, and the mother, kneeling beside her husband, said, "Save me, too! Save me, too!" And the Lord heard the prayers at that altar, and one of the happiest homes in England is the home over which that father and mother now lovingly preside. So, if in this sermon, I have warned others against a dissipated life, with the fact that so few return after they have once gone astray, for the encouragement of those who would like to return, I tell you God wants you to come back, every one of you, and to come back now, and more tenderly and lovingly than any mother ever lifted a sick child out of a cradle, and folded it in her arms, and crooned over it a lullaby, and rocked it to and fro, the Lord will take you up and fold you in the arms of his pardoning love.

There's a wideness in God's mercy,
Like the wideness of the sea.
There's a kindness in his justice,
Which is more than liberty.

THE THEOLOGICAL HALL OF THE DOSHISHA IN JAPAN.

The report of the deputation which went to Japan recently from the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions has just been published. Naturally, the future of the University founded by the late Joseph Neesima occupies an important place in the report. It is disappointing to learn that no arrangements could be made to insure the institution being Evangelical in its teaching. The Doshisha, it appears, is to be nominally Christian, but as the trustees declined to pledge themselves that "the beliefs for which the college stood in Japan should include belief in a personal God, in the divinity of Christ and the future life," it will be seen that there is little ground for hope that the Doshisha, under its new management, will be, in the sense of the Evangelical Church, a Christian institution.

them and tasting them and controlling their appetites." That is the best way of teaching them the Song of the Drunkards. Or if the education of the children in this music should be neglected, it is not too late to begin at twenty-one years of age. The young man will find plenty of young men who drink. They are in every circle to be found. Surely, my boy, you are not a coward, and afraid of it? Surely you are not going to be hindered by sumptuary laws or the prejudices of your old father and mother? They are behind the times. Take something. Take it often. Some of the greatest poets and orators have been notorious imbibers. If you are to transact business, your customer is apt to buy more if you have taken with him a sherry cobbler. If you are to make a speech it will give you a glibber tongue. Gluck could compose his best music by having his piano taken into the midst of a meadow, and a bottle of champagne placed on each side of him. The earlier you begin to learn the Song of the Drunkards the easier it is: but none of you are too old to learn. You can begin at fifty or sixty, under pre-whatever seemeth good in thy sight impose upon me. Let the bread of affliction be given me to eat. Take from me the friends of my confidence. Let those have me in derision who are younger than I. Let the passing away of my welfare be like the fleeting of a cloud and the shouts of my enemies like the rushing of waters. When I look for light, let darkness come upon me. Let the terrors of death be ever before me. Do all this, but save me, merciful God! Save me from the fate of a drunkard. Amen."

You see this sermon is not so much for cure as for prevention. Stop before you start, if you will forgive the solecism. The clock of St. Paul's cathedral struck thirteen one midnight, and so saved the life of a sentinel. The soldier was arrested and tried for falling asleep at his post one midnight; but he declared that he was awake at midnight, and in proof that he was awake he said that he had heard the unusual occurrence of the clock striking thirteen instead of twelve. He was laughed to scorn and sentenced to death; but three or four persons, hearing of the case, came

Sunday School Lesson for Jan. 24.
16. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

HE power given to the Apostles to preach and to heal, and which seems to have been suspended, or at least become inactive, after the sad strife among them which should be the greatest, was now abundantly restored. The Lord had promised it after his resurrection (Mark 16:15-18), and very fully were his words verified by the preaching of Peter, and by the "wonders and signs" done by the apostles in the power of the Holy Spirit. But a great change had come over them. Before the Lord had suffered, self had played a very prominent part in the ministry, not only for the twelve but also for the seventy, who had come back from their mission, saying: "Lord, even the devils are subject unto us in thy name." The Lord had to speak of Satan's fall in order to open their eyes, and he warned them not to rejoice because the spirits were subject to them. Perhaps it was the personal element in the ministry, both of the twelve and of the seventy which accounts for there being no further mention of their preaching or their healing until the time of Pentecost. Now the apostles had learned and had taken the lowest place, and now the Lord could use them, not as before, in their own energy and self-consciousness, but as empty, yielded instruments who would show forth not their virtues, but his. The fact that they were filled with the Holy Ghost did not make Peter and John or the other disciples independent of the accustomed times of worship. The ninth hour was the time of the evening sacrifice, the hour when Jesus died: and just because they knew it was fulfilled in the oblation of the Lamb of God, it meant more to them than to any others. It was at this hour that Peter and John were going up into the temple when a well known beggar accosted them, asking as usual for alms. They had probably often seen him, perhaps sometimes helped him, before. But now, as men filled with the Holy Ghost their relations to all men had undergone a change, they knew no man after the flesh (11. Cor. 5:16). It could no longer be a question with them as to whether it was convenient or not, whether even possible or not to help the man with money. Everything which came before them now was a question for God, not for them: to be measured by his resources and not theirs; decided by his will and not theirs. The good fight of faith, in the life of God-filled men, is to keep steadily in this position.

Peter's whole body was full of light and God the Holy Spirit was directing him as he said to the crippled beggar, "Look on us." What was the man to see? Not two rich men, full of benevolence, who would relieve him with unusual bounty: but two poor and unlearned men who, nevertheless were linked to and filled with, the very life of God himself. The man looked up and gazed steadily at them, and Peter said: "Silver and gold have I none, but such as I have, give I thee: In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, rise up and walk." And he took him by the right hand, and raised him up, and immediately his feet and his ankle bones received strength. How the contorted muscles were brought into shape, how the bones, which probably had been mere gristle until that moment, were rendered hard, firm and solid, and how the man who had never walked, received the internal conviction that he could bear his own weight, only he knows who alone doeth wondrous things," and who does them at this day where he is trusted. The man's faith as thus practically exhibited was as great a miracle as the Impartation of Strength to his helpless members. Instead of rising very slowly, and gradually letting his weight rest, first on one foot and then on the other, he actually leaped up and stood, an erect man, and began to walk without ever having learned to walk as a child! His first steps were directed towards the temple, when he entered with Peter and John, and in the new joy of his unexpected healing, he could not contain himself; he was "walking, leaping and praising God." The hand of God was in this: the man would not have been so conspicuous had he simply walked like any other man; but a man more than forty years of age (Acts 4:22), leaping with joy in the temple, very naturally attracted the attention of the public. They "saw him walking and praising God," and knew that it was the same familiar beggar who used to sit at the Beautiful Gate of the temple: "and they were filled with wonder and amazement at that which had happened unto him."

Peter had taken the man by his right hand, and now the man held him, and John, and, as is usual when something quite extraordinary happens, "the people ran together." This was no accident; it was God's way of calling an audience together. By this time they had reached Solomon's porch, and there the multitude assembled. It was

A God-given Opportunity.

Peter understood it; and in answer to the amazement of the people, he said, "Ye men of Israel, why marvel ye at this?" Many had been the miracles of healing wrought among them during the past three years and more, this was not an isolated case: they had indeed crucified him who "went about doing good and healing all that were possessed of the devil, for God was with him" (Acts 10:38); but God still lived; divine power to work miracles lived while God lived, and man could not destroy it.

Yet another question, "Why look ye so earnestly on us, as though by our own power or holiness we had made this man to walk?" In these words, Peter utterly disclaims an intrinsic power or holiness by virtue of which this deed of healing was done; he was but the instrument of the living God. Thousands who seek for divine healing really believe that some person can either heal at will, or can pray and believe for the healing of others at will, quite independently of the leading of the Holy Spirit. This is a great error, man can serve, but can never command God, and it is by virtue of what he is, and what he has said, that men can be healed, and in no way by virtue of the spiritual progress of any Christian.

Peter's explanation was that the God of Abraham and of Isaac and of Jacob, the God of our fathers hath glorified his Son Jesus . . . And his name through faith in his name, hath made the man strong, whom ye see and know, yea, the faith which is by him hath given him this perfect soundness in the presence of you all."

before their eyes; it needed no medical certificate to prove that this man had never been able to walk until this moment, and it needed no stronger evidence than that of their own eyesight that he was walking now. Who had wrought the change? The only witnesses knew that it was Jesus of Nazareth. What? this Man so dangerous to the influence of the priests and scribes, this Man whose teaching had swayed the multitudes, whose touch had given sight to the blind, at whose word sickness and even death had fled, and whom they had succeeded at last in silencing, was he exerting this mighty power from the grave itself, or were the rumors of his resurrection true, and was he again at large to condemn by his very presence those who had brought him to the cross?

The Jews were in a dilemma: neutrality was impossible: their very success in accomplishing the execution of the Lord had proved to be that which had increased his power. Instead of a few isolated disciples, thousands now were followers of the Crucified, and the works of power which he had done were repeating themselves among his disciples: what was to be done? Those who wanted to know the truth were at no loss, they saw they had made a grand mistake, they were broken and won.

AN ORIENTAL BEGGAR.

ELP for the helpless was the key-note struck by the first miracle wrought in the Apostolic era. Christianity began well its long career of beneficence. It is very significant that the first person to profit by the power imparted to the Apostles should have been not some rich or powerful man, but a lame beggar. Sitting at the beautiful gate of the Temple, with the magnificent building behind him and the lovely prospect of mountain and valley spread out before him, the beggar derived no benefit from nature or art. Christianity, represented by the two Apostles, on the way to the Temple to pray, approaches. The spectacle of the beggar was a test. Would these men, representing the new religion, pass him by as beneath their notice, or be so absorbed in the thoughts of devotion to which they were going that they would pay no heed to him? Christianity, in those days, did not so conduct itself. Its Founder had again and again suspended his teaching to heal the sick; he had left listening throngs to go to the comfort of a bereaved household; and his immediate followers acted in his spirit. The cripple asks a gift as he doubtless asks every passer-by. It was money he wanted, not knowing that something far better for him than money could be had from these two men. Since his day many a homeless wretch has entered the refuges opened in his name, craving only food and shelter, and has received blessings far more precious than he had ever conceived. Peter, frankly confesses his poverty, but the spirit of helpfulness is in him and of that he will give. "Such as I have give I thee," is his reply. That is still the measure of the Christian's resources. He may be poor, but he should have kindness and sympathy and love in his heart and if these were always ready at the call of the needy, the world would be far happier than it is. He has the secret of eternal life, but he is not always ready to impart it. "Such as I have give I thee" would be a good motto for every one who bears Christ's name. "Look on us," he says to the beggar, raising his expectation. Not too common, now, is that direction. We are too apt to refer the poor to some society, or to some benevolent organization, rather than bid them look to us to take the burden on ourselves and think out some plan of relief. Then the character of the help Peter has to give is disclosed, "In the name of Jesus of Nazareth, walk." Peter must have had strong faith in the power of that name to give such a command. But he was a changed man from the Peter who had denied his Lord and had taken upon himself to reprove him.

It takes a man who is himself changed, to work any kind of miracle. The teacher and the preacher must have experienced the power before they can impart it to others. The effect on the man is marvelous. It is an observant physician who is telling the story and he notes that Peter "took the man by the right hand and lifted him up and his feet and ankle-bones received strength and leaping up, he stood and began to walk." Contact is needed still for beneficent work. Nothing can be done while the church hold aloof and keeps at a distance from work that might soil its hands. It must go to those whom it would help and take them by the hand and raise them up. When it does that, the halting and helpless will receive strength for their own support.

Silver and gold have I none. The story is told that a Pope was conducting a visitor through the magnificent halls of his palace of the Vatican and showing him the jewels and treasures gathered there from all lands. "The day is past, you see," said the Pope, "when the Church has to say, 'silver and gold have I none.'" The visitor assented. "Yes," he said, "and the day is also past when the Church could say to the lame man, 'Rise and walk.'"

Such as I have, give I thee. A college professor, taking his constitutional walk on a winter evening, was accosted by a miserable man whose woe-begone face revealed the despair in his heart. The professor's sympathy was moved, but on searching his pockets he found, to his dismay, that he had no money. "My brother," he said, laying his hand on his shoulder, "I am truly sorry for thee; I wish I had something to give thee, but I have not." The man looked at him with eyes suffused with unaccustomed tears. "God bless you, sir," he said, "your compassion does me more good than anything you could give me."

Took him by the right hand. Mr. Gough used to give a similar account of the help he received in his early struggles to shake off his bondage to intoxicating drink. It was soon after he had signed the pledge. He was feeling all the horrors of the drunkard who had resolved to quit. Horrible shivering, as if there was ice in the marrow of his bones, followed by flashes of heat, as if every pore was punctured by a red-hot iron. He said: "I longed for just one glass. I knew that would give me relief. I believed the doctor would say I ought to have it. Then came the reflection, if you don't stick to the pledge you are lost. I wanted encouragement, sympathy. I went to the man I worked for and told him I had signed the pledge. The man smiled. I said, 'I mean to keep it.' He replied, 'they all say that.' I went back to my bench, crushed. I said, I have had enough of this. I shall die, and I may as well die one way as another. I cannot stand it. It is too hard for me.' Well, in the moment of despair I heard a cheerful voice: 'Good morning, Mr. Gough, good morning. Don't you know me? Mr. Goodridge, the lawyer. I saw you sign the pledge last night. I had a minute to spare this morning. I thought I'd just look in to see you. How are you feeling?' I said, 'I am feeling very badly.' He said, 'Yes, I suppose so. God bless you; keep a brave heart. Will you shake hands with me? Come in and see me any time. You will succeed if you will hold on.' He went out leaving me a different man. I repeated his words, 'keep a brave heart.' I said to myself, 'Yes, I think I can, now.'"

His name. How much a name is worth was realized not long ago by a young merchant who came to New York to buy goods. He was well connected and respected in the town where he was beginning business, but he was a stranger in New York. He went to a large house and told them he intended to be a customer, and was going to buy his first parcel then and there. The firm asked him a few questions, and the young man showed them statements as to his capital and his plans. The firm hesitated. Did he know any one who would endorse his note? The young man said that his father had a friend in the city and he would see him and call again. The next day he called with a brief note from his father's friend guaranteeing the account. The head of the firm glanced at the name at the foot of the letter, and said, "That is sufficient. You may have all the goods you want. He had faith in the name."

FAMINE-STRICKEN INDIA.

Widespread Distress Caused by Failure of Crops—Suffering Equal to that in the Famine of 1877—Enormous Appropriation by the Government.

FROM press correspondents, from missionaries, and from Government officials comes the sad news that India is in the throes of one of her periodical famines. A theory is current in India that a famine must be expected in that country every nineteen years, and it is a singular coincidence that it is exactly nineteen years since the last great famine, in which it was computed that five million persons died of starvation. The scarcity, it is thought, will be as widespread and as severe this year as it was in 1877 and 1878, and the need for relief consequently as great. From various sources an estimate is made that seventy million persons will need partial or entire support for several months, until the spring crops of rice are gathered in.

Happily, the Government is better prepared to deal with the famine now than it was in 1877, although the prodigious number to be supported must severely tax both its resources and its powers of administration. The difficulty formerly experienced was that of procuring and conveying food to the needy districts, but now railroads are in operation which will quickly carry supplies to any district in which they are needed, and already the Government has prepared for the strain by purchasing wheat from Odessa and from our California shippers. It has also commenced relief works which are designed to serve the double purpose of giving employment to the needy and of increasing the facilities of transportation. Already three hundred thousand men have been set to work in this way, thus providing them and their families, numbering in all probably from one and a half to two million persons, with the necessities of life. One hundred and thirty-five million dollars have been voted by the Government for these various systems of relief.

The north and northwest provinces will suffer most severely, though the pressure hitherto has been felt chiefly in Madras and Bengal, in the east. But it is in Oudh, bad, which are all densely populated. There the people are poor, and though they can exist on as little as about a cent a day, they are unable to get even that small sum. The cost of wheat in those districts is now three times its normal price, and is consequently far beyond the reach of the very poor. In the most prosperous times they live from hand to mouth, and are never far removed from starvation. The slightest disturbance of the labor market, or a rise in the cost of food, reduces these people to hunger. Already, cases of most deplorable suffering are reported. The Rev. Herbert J. Molony, of the Church Missionary Society, writes: How can I describe the sights seen in the bazaar, and even at our own door—the veritable living skeletons in rags who struggle in from the villages, and who look so bad that you feel you must give them food or they will lie down where they are and die! These we keep for a few days in sheds near our house, and when they get a little stronger we send them down to the rest-house in the town provided with a relief ticket, which will ensure them daily food until they are strong enough to go on the relief works. About a dozen of these have died in our compound, and others at the rest-house. The little children are the most piteous cases. We have nursed some ourselves, tending them hour by hour, and others have been cared for under our constant supervision, and with medical help; and yet they die—some at once, some after weeks of fighting against dysentery, dropsy, or emaciation.

A peculiarly distressing incident is reported by a missionary at Aminabad. A man who had not been able to get any food for his family in four days, took his only son and sold him into servitude. He had not been able to obtain more than the equivalent of a dollar for the boy, but he was able to get food, and he took enough for a meal to his home. His wife, knowing nothing of the sacrifice by which the food had been secured, prepared the meal. But she refused to eat until her hungry son could join his parents. Then the poor husband and father was obliged to confess what he had done. The woman was distracted with grief, and in her frenzy committed suicide. Her husband, grieving over the loss of his boy, was overwhelmed with this new calamity and promptly followed his wife's example.

The Rev. A. Muller, of the Kurku mission at Elechpur, writes: "I have seen starving men, women and children like skeletons, covered with skin, crouched like bundles alongside railway stations, hoping to get help from the passengers. The number of beggars imploring food has increased immensely. In one case I saw 1,500 men, women and children seated in rows. Two big spoonfuls of cooked rice and two little cakes were given to each applicant. This is quickly devoured, and with an almost invariable wail they cry in vain for more food, tormented by the tions by the obstinacy and lack of energy of the native officials, who are not only dilatory in administering the relief provided, but sometimes actually hoard for themselves the food for want of which the people are dying. The extent of this obstruction cannot be realized by any one not familiar with the Hindoo character. A correspondent who witnessed the famine of 1877, says that there was one case which came under his own observation. The government had sent a wagon load of sacks of rice to a district where the famine was reported to be very severe. The English convoy left it at the house of the native official to distribute to his starving countrymen. His house was soon filled with people dying for lack of food, who came eagerly when they heard the news of the arrival of the rice. They waited patiently the great man's pleasure to begin the distribution. He proceeded in a leisurely fashion to take the name, residence and other details about each applicant, and to enter them neatly in his books. Several hours after the rice had arrived, the English officer who had superintended its removal found the official still entering the names, and in his presence were some corpses of applicants who had died while waiting for the food. The officer ordered his men to tear open the bags with their bayonets, and with his own hands helped the starving crowd to the food. The Hindoo official wrung his hands in despair to see men receiving government supplies, whose names had not been recorded. An experience such as this will doubtless lead to a more expeditious system of relief work in the present crisis.

Mr. J. L. Lawson, of the American Methodist Mission at Aligarh, North-west Provinces, writes: "The horrors of the famine are indescribable. A few days ago I made a tour through several villages in my district. In one place I found 137 little children, most of them under twelve years of age, and many of them not more than four or five, whose parents had died or deserted them. These children were found in the streets and bazaars picking up grain which had fallen on the floor, and eating it raw. Temporary provision is being made by the government for the daily food of these children. I could have brought away a hundred, if I had the money to support them."

The following letter from Mr. Nikambi, the Christian Hindoo teacher, gives a vivid picture of the situation:

It is now well known to all the civilized world that India is visited with a universal and most terrible famine at the present time. Its devastating and destructive effects have been felt, alike, all over the country, from east to west and north to south. The extreme misery and the untold human distress, for want of food, are unparalleled in the whole history of the country. It cannot, however, be denied that India is subject to partial famines in every ten or fifteen years, but those famines are nothing compared with the present most awful famine.

Fifty millions of people are actually starving, and it has become an urgent problem how to save so many from starvation during the coming twelve months. The English government and the people of that country are doing their best to send food to the starving multitudes, but it seems practically impossible to provide adequately to satisfy the cravings of hunger of such an immense population, unless the benevolent and charitable Christian nations of the world unite to help. Though people may differ in faith, race, and color, yet they are children of the same Father in heaven and hence brothers.

It has been our highest privilege while in America during the last fifteen months, to watch with interest the doings of the philanthropic and Christian people of this country. Especially we remember the sympathy aroused for Armenia. I must confess that I was greatly struck with the generosity and liberality of the people of America, and I have learned from this circumstance, that the Americans have very sympathetic and kind hearts. I believe if they are convinced of the suffering in India, many will gladly contribute towards its relief. I hear of native parents selling their children for food, others drowning themselves rather than face sorrow and suffering. I am extremely sad to hear also that many poor native Christians are on the verge of starvation along with their millions of most unfortunate non-Christian countrymen. A committee, consisting of four leading Christians in Bombay, and the Rev. E. Abbott of the American Marathi Mission, Bombay, has been formed to receive funds. Subcommittees have also been appointed at different centres to distribute help. If sympathetic friends in America desire to send help to India, I am sure their timely sympathy would be greatly appreciated. They have sent many missionaries to preach the Gospel to the people of India, and therefore they will see the importance of helping at such a time as this.

What One Man Did for Christ.

Bishop Mallaliu writes of the founder of Gammon Theological Seminary: "Yonder in far-away Maine is a young man who heard the call of God to preach the Gospel. A throat trouble disabled him. He was obliged to leave the ministry and go into business, and in due time became possessed of hundreds of thousands of dollars. He decided to lay his wealth on the altar of service and selected Atlanta as the seat of the mission he would found.

"Hence we have this school of the prophets, with a plan and endowment of no less than $600,000. Elijah Gammon, disabled, discouraged, thwarted in what he thought God had told him to do, has laid the foundations and provided for the needs of a seat of learning where tens of thousands of young men shall be trained to become able ministers of the Gospel."

Rajputanah, and the Pungab that the lack of rain, which is the cause of the famine has been most marked. There the greatest failure of the crops has occurred, and the suffering must be most acute. The northwest provinces and Oudh cover an area of 25,000 square miles, with a population of thirteen millions. The next in urgency is an area of 30,000 square miles, with a population of fourteen millions, and there is a third area in which, it is said, there have been partial crops in which there are twelve and a half million persons. The worst districts at present reported are those of Allahabad, Lucknow, and Faizagnawing of hunger. Hundreds of voices clamoring in every key for the food we cannot give produce a bitter chorus of crying. Now, as in the famine of 1877, the government is embarrassed in its relief opera-

Little Paraguay and its People.

A Diminutive South American Paradise, where Customs Never Change and all Nature is Delightful—Its Surplus of Women.

EVERY passing year serves to bring us nearer, commercially and socially, to our neighbors on the southern side of the Gulf of Mexico. This increased familiarity with the peoples of the South American sisterhood of republics has helped to forge stronger and closer ties than those of commercial interest alone.

Mr. I. G. King, a traveler, who has visited almost all of the South American countries, and some of whose letters from those lands have at different times appeared in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has sent us, together with two interesting photographs which appear on this page, the following pleasantly descriptive letter, relative to a recent visit to Paraguay:

The least favored to-day of the Southern Republics are Ecuador, Bolivia, and little land-locked Paraguay. These retain more or less the social customs that were known to exist two or three hundred years ago, their populations being similar in character and habits of life. I remained in Paraguay for some months and made its people a study.

Paraguay is indeed a beautiful land,—a tropical forest, cloven by broad rivers with gardens fair as that of the Hesperides, intervening between the places of denser growth; a realm of lotus-eaters where the worn traveler, like the followers of Ulysses, might be tempted to cry, "I will no longer roam." Many a traveler or sailor is here captivated by the lazy influences of the soft, beautiful climate, and has stayed, unwilling to return, settling amid those gentle hills that slope to the Paraguay River, amid groves of oranges, bananas and pawpaws, with white-robed, silent Indian women serving him as slaves.

The Guaranis were nearly exterminated in recent wars, and to this day it is said that there exist nine women to one man. Many are the virtues of these poor brave Paraguayans. They are hospitable, kindly and honest, and deeds of violence are rare among them. The men are below the average height of North Americans, but well developed and muscular, dressing similar to the people of Argentina, who are designated as Guachos, with white pantaloons and poncho, a broad belt and an apron of trimmed leather, except in the cities. The upper class affect the European mode. In the country, the children are allowed to go unclothed, except in the coldest days.

The girls are taught to carry water jars on their heads as soon as they can walk, and when grown, they are scarcely ever seen without some burden. Toys are almost unknown to the children. Give the girls a doll and it will be handled with curiosity and admiration for a while, but is sure to be soon appropriated by their elders, probably to appear presently dressed up as a gorgeous saint. These children are scarcely if ever seen romping in play, but go about like old people. I have seen them engaged at playing church with the greatest solemnity and apparent devotion.

The women are not unclothed; they are well moulded, have lustrous eyes, and are of various shades, from mahogany to a complexion almost as fair as the Anglo-

Saxon. Their dress consists of a snow-white tunic, worn quite short, and often a white shawl, a contrast to the dingy-black robe of Argentina. They are always barefooted, only the upper classes wearing boots. "The shod people" is the Guaraní expression for aristocracy. The language of the conquered and not of the conquerors alone is spoken amongst them, and the phrase "mother-tongue" has there its full significance, except among the highest families, who, in these latter days, are educated in Castilian at their schools. In spite of their isolation from the rest of the world and their want of education, Paraguayans are remarkably polite in their manners and address. In approaching a house there is some ceremony to be observed. One is expected to halt and call out; then comes the reply, "Sin pecado," and you receive the invitation to enter—"Adelante, señor."

No one works from 11 A.M. to 2 P.M. The hours intervening are strictly devoted diverging branches for handles, the trunk four or five feet long with the point sharpened and hardened by burning; a couple of oxen hitched to it by means of a bar across their horns, and the implement is complete. Spinning cotton, probably the most ancient art there—is still performed with the distaff. The women make a kind of lace that is extremely beautiful and a marvel of delicacy. Marketing and agricultural pursuits are carried on by their women alone while supporting the male part of the population in indolence and idleness. One of our photographs shows the women wholly in control in the market-place, where all the business passes through their hands. Another illustration presents a boat-loading scene, where the women are performing the work of longshoremen. The finest oranges in the world are harvested in Paraguay during nearly every season of the year. They are picked and transported to their shipping centres by the women, being carried in baskets on their heads. The loading of steamers with the fruit is performed by gangs of chattering and light-hearted women and girls, who wait around the docks for work of that description.

Warned by a Child.

A pastor relates the following instructive incident: A Christian lady lay upon her death-bed. Her husband was already dead; and reflecting that her little daughter would soon have to be handed over to the charge of her grandfather, who was an infidel, she was filled with anxiety at the prospect, and, calling the child to her side, she obtained from her a promise that for her sake she would read one chapter of the Bible to herself every day. The child soon after was removed to the house of the infidel, and, faithful to her promise, was found by him one day reading to herself in the garden. Inquiring to know what book it was, she replied it was her Bible. He at once began to make light of to breakfast and siesta, a season for lounging in hammocks and sipping yerba, a dry and powdered leaf (from a native shrub of the holly family) which contains a bitter principle, similar to that found in tea and coffee. It is taken in a very odd way. A gourd, stained black (which is the mata), holds about four ounces of yerba, it filled to the top. The bombellia, a tube of metal with a bulbous end pierced full of holes, is then inserted, the gourd is filled with boiling water and the infusion sucked through the tube. Every herb and flower is supposed by these people to be a remedio, and there are legions of plants growing in Paraguay known to be medicinal. I heard an Englishman relate his experience in gathering wild-flowers, one day, when a country girl came along with a bundle of vegetables on her head. After watching him for a moment she inquired shyly, "For what disease is that a remedy?" Said he, "None that I know of." "Then why do you pick it?" "Because, like you, it is light and pretty," was the reply. "Ni-nah che carai" (don't tease me, sir), said the girl, and turned away as if insulted.

Those appliances belonging to agricultural and domestic manufactures are exceedingly primitive. The loose, sandy soil of Paraguay demands little dressing, and is merely scratched with the rudest of plows, the thick bough of a tree with two it, declared that it was useless to read such a book, and asked what was the good of it. She answered that she might learn of God. "God," he said: "there is no God."

The effect of this upon the child can scarcely be described, so great was her fright and amazement. For the moment she appeared petrified; but, recovering herself, exclaimed with passionate earnestness, "Oh, grandfather, you're a fool; you're a fool; you're a fool!" The man was amazed at this extraordinary audacity on the part of his granddaughter; but the child continued to exclaim, "Oh, grandfather, you're a fool! The Bible says you are a fool! 'The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God.'" (Psalm 14: 1.) The man listened no longer; but to forget it was impossible. Wherever he went, by night and by day, every waking moment seemed to come into his mind, "You are a fool! The Bible says so!" The result was that he became miserably unhappy and broken down before God, and the Lord graciously used the circumstance to his conversion.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

An Odd Midnight Charity.

(See Colored Illustration on First Page.)

IF the absence of ostentation and public display in the administering of our charities be a merit (as the Scriptures declares), there is assuredly a special degree of merit and worthiness in the very remarkable charity which our artist has depicted in the strong and realistic illustration on the first page of this issue. When all New York, with the exception of the few whose callings keep them up at night, is fast asleep, and when the great avenues of trade are silent and deserted, any pedestrian who might happen to walk in the vicinity of Tenth street and Broadway about midnight would witness a singular sight. Along the sidewalk on the northerly side of Tenth street he would see a long line of men, and if he were to go sufficiently near, he would discover that they were in almost every instance poorly clad, with hungry-looking, eager faces and a general air of hopeless poverty. This line, usually about 300, but sometimes nearly 500 strong, assembles every night at the same hour, and by 12 P.M. it is complete. Sometimes there are a few destitute-looking women in the line, but the great majority are men. The head of the line is midway between Fourth avenue and Broadway.

At the stroke of midnight, a door opens and light streams out on the dark sidewalk. The crowded line presses up toward the open doorway, where several white-capped and white-aproned men stand beside great piles of loaves of bread. There is a grateful odor of coffee, too, and it is soon apparent that the outside crowd is appreciative of the fact, for they press the harder as one after another at the head of the line receives from the white-capped men a loaf and a mug of hot coffee, and then mumbling his thanks, marches off to make room for the next. Some receive half a loaf, others a whole one, and if the night be chill and frosty, the coffee is in as much demand as the bread. And so the distribution proceeds, until all are supplied. Some carry their loaves home, to wife or children hungrier, perhaps, than themselves. Others begin to eat their portion at once, and gulp down their steaming coffee. In cases of special need a couple of loaves are given. By one o'clock the line has vanished, the door has closed, and Tenth street has resumed its wonted quiet.

This unique scene—the only midnight charity in America—is enacted nightly at the Vienna Bakery, whose Tenth street side entrance is directly opposite the great business block erected by the late A. T. Stewart. It has been going on for twenty years past, though comparatively few New Yorkers know it. In 1876, Mr. Louis Fleischmann, having a successful business there, decided to give to the poor all the bread that was left undisposed of after his wagons came in for the night. He began to give a few dozen loaves at first, but the demand for the bread grew, and the gift brought blessing, for his business steadily increased also. The midnight distribution is made all the year round, in the hot, sweltering nights of summer and the arctic chill of the winter. Among the beneficiaries are poor, idle workmen, and many homeless tramps, all nationalities being represented. There are never any discords in the quiet line that gathers nightly, and which encircles nearly half the block; the men know that a disturbance would mean the stoppage of their free gift, and that they cannot afford to sacrifice. A loaf of bread means much to a penniless, homeless man in New York. There are at the present time many thousands of honest idle men in the city, and to this deserving class and those who may be dependent upon them, the nightly gift of a loaf or two comes like heaven-sent manna.

The giver of this weekly secret charity (if anything that takes place on the streets of New York can be called secret), has purposely avoided publicity as far as possible; but the grateful prayers of the many thousands who have been helped by the "midnight loaf," during these twenty years, doubtless afford him a deeper and more enduring satisfaction than could be derived from mere worldly approbation of his generosity. It is truly Christian charity, with a single eye to the helping of a class whose members are helpless indeed.

THE MODERN JEW IN HIS ANCESTRAL HOME

BY HON. SELAH MERRILL D.D. L.L.D.

THE SADNESS OF JERUSALEM.

It is a City Without Recreations—Its People are Gloomy, its Children Joyless, and even its Animals are Dull—The Struggle to Live.

It is an ancient belief that mirth and song affect the character, and on the other hand that by them character is expressed. Experience has proved this to be true both of individuals and of nations. One has said that he could control a nation's laws were he allowed to make its ballads. We know how inspiring are the hymns of our Christian faith, we remember well how the patriotic songs of our country stirred our hearts in the days of battle.

The Hebrews had a variety of words expressing mirth, gladness, joy, to make merry, and the like, and with them men, the ancient Assyrians, such words were always associated with the ideas of peace, pleasantness, light, and triumph. Old Jerusalem seems to have had its share of pleasure-making, song and joy, but in the Jerusalem of today there is a noticeable absence of these things. When a nation's life is healthy we expect there will be manifested a good degree of mirth and gladness, we expect light hearts, bright hopes, laughing children, every expression characteristic of a happy people. When such things are wanting, we feel that there must be a reason for the fact, and it is on this account that our topic appeals to us with special interest. For our hearts, one and all, turn to Jerusalem with delight, and her welfare is our pride. One and all we grieve over her decay and ruin, and eagerly ask why her streets and homes are places of sadness.

No one desires or expects that Jerusalem should be given up to merry-making nor, quite as certainly, does the stranger expect to find in the cheerless, joyless, mirthless city that it really is. It has no public entertainments of any kind. Some years since, outside the walls, a building was erected designed for a playhouse, and it was thought by certain natives together with a few Greeks and Italians of the commonest class, that the new resort would become at once popular and prove a financial success. These hopes were quickly blasted, for the place never had funds for its support, it had no actors, and no patrons, and not many months elapsed before the upper portion was turned into a very cheap coffee shop, and the basement into a donkey stable. This was the beginning and the end of the only attempt in modern times to establish a theatre in the Holy City. It was entirely out of place. The inhabitants have no taste for such a thing, and even if they had, could not patronize or support it, simple because they are very poor. A stranger might argue that even if Jerusalem had no theatre there might be other forms of public entertainment; but I would assure him that this destitution extends to every variety of amusement known to American life.

If the absence of pleasure making is decidedly conspicuous in Jerusalem, it does not follow that universal quiet reigns, for the streets of the city are terribly noisy, not equalled in this respect by any city of Europe. There is a superabundance of loud talking and a great deal of shouting, but there is no fun; there are numerous street quarrels, but no street songs. The songs, if any, are the plaintive monologues of beggars. The inhabitants, on the whole, are a sober people, for although almost without exception they use intoxicating liquor, they are not drunken in the streets, so that the noise cannot be attributed to such a cause, nor indeed do their quarrels arise from drink, but nearly always from their extreme poverty. This makes them exacting in the most minute details of any transaction; I have known quarrels to arise scores of times over so small a matter as three-tenths of an American cent.

The lack of cheerful stirring enterprise in the people accounts for the dullness which is so apparent and, like the men and women, the children also are heavy and stupid. They have no sprightliness. With us a boy is sometimes so full of life that he is the terror of the household; but in Jerusalem, what does a boy's life amount to? He cannot swim for there is no water. He cannot play ball for there is no field smooth enough for the purpose. He cannot engage in any athletic sports for the boys there never do such things, and were he to even attempt to do it he would be thought crazy. He is not taught to read, and has no books. To means for his diversion, no one ever gives a thought. As soon as he is able to do any work he joins in the universal struggle for daily bread.

In our own country, if young people, even those who work hard, get a little lei-that gambol or young domestic animals of any kind that skip and leap for joy. These creatures, from the first months of their lives, are as moderate in their movements and as sedate in all their behavior as cows of mature years. How much their living has to do with this I cannot say; but cattle as well as men have to struggle for the scanty food which they obtain.

Possibly I ought to mention a form of amusement which is very popular with the Arabs, but which, for several reasons, is indulged in only to a limited extent, and that is horse-racing. Only the sons of well-to-do parents can afford this pastime, and moreover there are no roads or smooth places in the fields where trials of speed can be had at a given distance, so that the style of Arab horse-racing is quite different from ours. The horse is made to plunge forward suddenly and at full gallop, and after a few yards is stopped as suddenly; this brings the entire weight of the rider and his beast upon the forelegs, and the strain upon the animal's knees is terrible. Not infrequently a valuable horse is in this way completely ruined. This practice comes down no doubt from the time when mounted men fought with spears in close combat, and I base my judgment upon what I have seen of warfare among Bedouins of the desert.

In Oriental places gambling is under the head of amusements. This vice prevails universally, is the curse of young men, and the only thing that keeps them from ruin is their very great poverty. A man who has nothing can lose nothing by gambling. The sin of the act is not measured by the amount staked. In camp, in coffee shops, among muleteers, among workmen and gate, get a cup of coffee (by "cup" one must think of those used in children's play-houses), and a smoke (in a hubble-bubble pipe) for about a cent for both, talk a little, sometimes listen to a long story, sit hour after hour on a low, hard stool, fall asleep, watch their companions, pass a great many meaningless compliments, and persuade themselves that this is the height of pleasure.

CHILDREN TAKING A DONKEY-RIDE.

What shall we say of that country or condition of social life where, for tens of thousands of the inhabitants, this is the chief amusement of their lives? I am not making this picture to criticise, but merely to acquaint my readers with the facts. In appearance and character these coffee shops do not change from generation to generation. In commendation of them it should be said that nearly all of these places close at sunset.

Among children, and in fact among grown people, one notices the absence of pets. The time and thought bestowed upon such things with us is in striking contrast to the condition of things in Jerusalem. It would be out of the possibilities to make pets of dogs, for they are unclean. Cats are despised and if they live about a house it is in a semi-wild state. Occasionally a caged bird is seen, but generally these are instances where the families have come in contact with foreigners. Chickens, lambs and young donkeys are never petted, but they do not seem to be at all wild, for they live, sleep and eat with the children of the household as though they had equal rights with them.

In recent times the band of native musicians connected with the garrison plays in the street, near the barracks, almost every day, and a crowd is always attracted to the spot. The music is of a very common order, the exercise is agony to Europeans, and whether the street listeners enjoy it or not, it is hard to say, for they are silent and undemonstrative, and disperse as quickly as they came together.

Within three years past the city government has made an effort to establish a public garden. The entire work of grading and planting shrubs was done over no less than three times, owing to the ignorance of those in charge of it. One could say beforehand that in Jerusalem such a garden would be a failure, because they had no water. After much effort it was completed; still it compares very unfavorably with even the smallest gardens in European countries. But the thought and the effort to establish such a garden in Jerusalem ought to be commended, although it can never become a pleasant resort.

In connection with the fact just mentioned, the people of Jerusalem and Palestine seem, in spite of their Oriental indifference and fixedness of life, to have some power of imitation. The desire to adopt other modes of life is not wholly foreign to them. What I have observed in regard to native boys, will serve as an illustration. Whenever they come into contact with European boys with their sports, games, and many activities, they soon want to do the same things. Let us regard this kindling aspiration for something better, a few signs of which we see here and there, as a ground of encouragement for the inhabitants of dear old Jerusalem.

sure, they think they must do something in the way of diversion. They get up a picnic, they go boating, or they play tennis. They are full of energy, and spend the same in the many forms of recreation and pleasure that are open before them. In a very hot country like Palestine, boys, whenever they get a short respite from work, as they are scantily fed, and hence not overflowing with animal spirits, never think of going anywhere to have a good time; they simply lie down in the shade of a tree or of a great rock. No doubt climate has its influence in diminishing or stimulating sprightliness of temperament.

A curious fact which I have noticed on hundreds of occasions is, namely, that animals are affected like human beings and exhibit similar characteristics. If one never sees, in Palestine, children romp and frolic, in like manner, he never sees lambs boys, among all classes, and at almost all times, we see small groups of people who are gambling. The vice is certainly a popular one, and there must be a fascination about it which is quite unknown to those who never indulge.

The coffee shops of Jerusalem afford a sort of diversion unlike anything with which we are acquainted in America, and they come nearer being places of amusement than anything else. They are exclusively for men, as women never frequent them, nor do children. There are scores of these places in the city, many of them being very rude, small, dingy, dirty rooms hardly fit for donkey stalls, around the entrance to which men sit, while the best of them are barren and cheerless, seldom neat, always unattractive. Natives having been accustomed to them all their lives, appear to enjoy them. Here men congre-

Home Defence.

IT is of vast importance that the military regiments of our cities be maintained.

There are in all our cities populations that can understand gunpowder as an argument for peace better than they can understand any other argument. The consciousness that back of the law and back of the ballot-box, and back of the mayor's chair, there are bayonets, is a mighty inducement to keep order. The chief use of our home regiments is not merely to put on parade dress and to the step of a brass band, march up and down in front of balconies filled with the beauty and fashion of the town, but to be ready when mobs arise or populations are panic-stricken, or a foreign enemy suddenly drops down. For the home regiments of our cities, I bespeak all honor and support, and may God grant us such quietude that their services shall never be wanted save in festivity and commemoration. Stack arms!

While I was living in Philadelphia that city was threatened with mobocracy. I joined a regiment. There were in the regiment many clergymen. It was the most awkward squad of men ever gotten together. We drilled a week or two, and then disbanded. All together, I do not believe we could have defended, a hen-roost. I then felt the need of troops, drilled month after month and year after year.

He Was a Man.

IN our extollation of Christ as divine we forget that he was just as certainly human. That side of the Saviour's nature we need more strength to understand. We must have a Christ who is able to walk with us day by day, up and down these streets, and cross with us these ferries—a Christ to come into our parlors and help us in the socialities of life, into our nurseries to help us in the care of our children, into our dining-halls and kitchens to help us in the annoyances and irritations of housekeeping. While the Unitarians will not go with us in worshipful treatment of Christ as divine, we will go with them in the recognition of a Saviour's humanity. O, thou Man of Sorrows! Take all our griefs. O, thou Man of Pain! Take all our sickness. O, thou Man of Sympathy! Give us thy companionship. O, thou Man of Bethany! Stay at our homes and help Mary in her devotions and Martha in her anxieties. What an eternal sedative, the thought that Christ was bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh, and that he understands us, for that he traveled the same road, suffered the same wrongs, and wept the same bereavements. Into the hands of this Being, who was thorough Man as well as thorough God, we commend you. May his blessing be upon all your souls and you be enabled to employ the following words of an anonymous writer, as sweet words as you ever read:

O, to be nothing, nothing, only to lie at his feet; A broken and emptied vessel, for the Master's use made meet:

Emptied that he might fill me as to his service I go;

Broken, that so unhindered his life through me might flow.

O, to be nothing, nothing; an arrow in his hand, Or a messenger at his gateway, waiting for his command—

Only an instrument, ready for him to use at his will,

And should he not require me, willing to wait there still.

Thine may I be, thine only, till called by thee to share

The glorious heavenly mansion thou art gone before to prepare.

My heart and soul are yearning to see thee face to face,

With unfettered tongue to praise thee for such heights and depths of grace.

Stagnation vs. Sensation.

WITH two offensive words we head this article. We do not know which word is the worst. It is the national habit in literature and religion to call that sensationalism which we ourselves cannot do. If an author writes a book that will not sell, he is apt to charge the books of the day which do succeed as being sensational. There are a great many men who, in the world and the Church, are dead failures, who spend their time in letting the public know that they are not sensationalists. This fact is, that they never made any stir while living, nor will they in dying, save as they rob the undertaker of his fees, they not leaving enough to pay their dismission expenses.

We hate sensationalism in the pulpit, so far as that word means the preaching of everything but the Gospel; but the simple fact is, that whenever and wherever faith, and repentance, and heaven, and hell are proclaimed with emphasis, there will be a sensation. The people in our great cities are hungry for the old Gospel of Christ. If our young men in the ministry want large audiences let them quit philosophizing, and hair-splitting, and botanizing, and without gloves take hold of men's sins and troubles, and there will be no lack of hearers. Stagnation is worse than sensationalism. We have always noticed that just in proportion as a man cannot get along himself, he is fearful of some one else making an excitement. Last week, a mud-turtle down by the brook, opened its shell, and discoursed to a horse that was coming down to drink. The mud-turtle said to the horse: "Just as I get sound asleep, you are sure to come past and wake me up. We always used to have a good quiet time down here in the swamp till you got in the habit of thumping along this way. I am conservative, and like to keep in my shell. I have been pastor of thirteen other mud-turtles, and we always had peace till you came, and next week at our semi-annual meeting of mud-turtles we shall either have you voted a nuisance, or will talk it over in private, eight or ten of us, which will probably be the more prudent way." Then the mud-turtle's shell went shut with a snap, at which the horse kicked up his heels as he turned to go up to the barn to be harnessed to a load of corn that was ready for the market. Let us all wake up and go to work. There are in the private membership of our Churches, and in the ministry, a great many men who are dead, but have never had the common decency to get buried. With the harvest white and "lodging" for lack of a sickle, instead of lying under the trees criticising the sweating reapers who are at work, let us throw off our own coats, and go out to see how good a swathe we can cut, and how much grain we can garner.

"The Little Gospels."

THIS is the beautiful and affectionate term given to those wonderful condensations of the popular heart, with which the Master-Preachers of Christianity, from Christ until the close of the eighteenth century, feathered every arrow in their sermons. For though arguments are the pillars of a discourse, proverbs and metaphors are its windows. Without stopping to consider the prominence given to proverbs in the Old Testament, we may notice that Christ, at his first appearance in the synagogue, and in all his prominent discourses, set these "little Gospels" in the pure gold of Christian ethics. The Sermon on the Mount is full of Jewish proverbs, current among the common people for centuries; yea, even in the grief and love of the Last Supper, he defines the treachery of Judas in a proverb, and later, in the majesty of his risen glory, arrests the persecuting Saul by another.

Perhaps no feature of Christ's teaching is more remarkable than that he who spake as never man spake, should choose words already dear to the popular heart, and which, being the outcome of universal experience, would have an universal and everlasting meaning; thus—"Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness," is identical with the Arabic—"Purchase the next world with this, and so win both." "No man can serve two masters," resembles the Greek, "He who has to serve two masters, must lie to one;" and again, "He giveth his beloved [in their] sleep," is but another form of the Roman proverb, "The net of the sleeping fishermen takes."

The early fathers not only used the rich store of pagan and biblical proverbs, they originated many now in use. But if we would see the real value of proverbs in preaching, Luther must be studied; for it was by the mother-wisdom of the trenchant, pathetic proverbs of Germany, he opened the hearts of the people to the doctrines of the Reformation. Truly few preachers can wear Father Luther's shoes, but they may follow in his footsteps. Jeremy Taylor, Fuller, Richard Baxter, Isaac Barrow, are mines of proverbial ecclesiastical wealth, and even the Scotch Covenanters found it well to point their arguments with popular wisdom. "I'll down the nests, and the crows will fly away," edged the fury of those that demolished the strongholds of popery.

None of the noble preachers anterior to our own century, disdained the popular maxims which fastened the truth as with a nail in a sure place. There is no better proof of this than Matthew Henry's "Exposition," which is a very "Mosaic of proverbs on a basis of sandal wood." This same popular element was one of the secrets of the wonderful success of the early Methodist preachers. It was "the Hebrew tongue" to which "the common people gave the more silence." That this mighty influence has become unfashionable in the pulpit, is a marvel. Why do not our preachers, so eager for popularity, consider this means of acquiring it, for no matter how much a preacher may know, preacher and peasant know more than preacher alone; since there is no shade of character which has not passed through the alembic of the great heart of humanity, and become a proverb.

I have called sacred proverbs "Little Gospels," and I will quote a few, to illustrate the propriety of the term:

God builds the nest of the blind bird.
When God gives, he asks not, whose son art thou?
God is an ancient giver.

When the tale of bricks is doubled, then comes Moses.

Our extremity is God's opportunity.
Charity gives itself rich.

God never smites with both hands.
The tree God plants, no wind hurts.

Get the distaff and spindle ready, God will send the flax.

God blesses the giving hand, and makes it a getting hand.

Let the grapes pray for the branches, without branches there would be no grapes.

Finally, let us add the rabbinical precept in regard to the Bible:

Read it, and read it again, for everything is in it.

Have I not proved that good proverbs are like steel in a fountain? the sparkle pleases the eye, the tonic strengthens the heart; they are the "Little Gospels" which our ancestors graved over their hearthstones, and on their dining-tables, and the lintels of their doors; hopeful earnestness of that day, when the prophecy of Zechariah shall be fulfilled, and "on every pot, and upon the bells of the horses, Holiness unto the Lord" shall be inscribed.

BRIEF NOTES.

No more orders can be filled for "Gospel Hymns" No. 1 to 6, Consolidated, Music Edition, our stock being entirely exhausted.

The number of Christian Endeavor Societies in Great Britain has now passed the four thousand mark.

The Methodist and Congregational churches of Barre, Mass., united recently in revival services conducted by Evangelist E. A. Whittier. Both churches cordially co-operated, and many conversions are reported.

Evangelist Gale has closed his meetings at Skowhegan, Me., and has begun a series at Houlton. About three hundred persons in the former town made public confession of faith in Christ during the series of services.

A contemporary which has been collecting the statistics of colleges states that there are now in public institutions preparing for the ministry 7,657 young men. Of these the Presbyterians have a larger number than any other denomination.

The twenty-third anniversary of the organization of the Reformed Episcopal Church was celebrated recently by special services in the Church of the Reconciliation in Brooklyn, N. Y. Bishop T. W. Campbell outlined the history of the church.

Count Leo Tolstoi is to be placed on trial for Heterodoxy. The Holy Synod, the supreme authority in the Russian Church, has summoned him to appear at its bar to answer the charge that his books are calculated to undermine the orthodoxy of the readers and so weaken the authority and power of the church.

The McAll Missions in France are burdened with a debt of eight thousand dollars. A citizen of San Francisco who attended the recent annual meeting, having listened to the report, volunteered to give half of the total debt if other friends of the mission would raise the other half before the end of next March.

The annual gain of Christians in the various mission fields is now estimated by the Missionary Review of the World, at one hundred thousand. Ten years ago, by the same mode of calculation, the annual increase was found to be sixty thousand. In 1825 there were only sixty thousand Christians in the mission churches of the world.

Dr. F. E. Clark, President of the Christian Endeavor Society, sends from Europe, as a suggestion to the Christian Endeavor societies of the world, the plan of occupying a few moments in every Christian Endeavor prayer meeting, or at least occasionally, with a summary of the pastor's morning sermon. The plan should prove helpful alike to young people and pastor.

New York had a visit from Dr. Alberto Diaz, the apostolic evangelist of Cuba, who had a narrow escape for his life in getting out of the hands of the Spaniards. Dr. Diaz preached in Calvary Church in New York, where he received a warm welcome. His references to the condition of the island to the evangelization of which he has given his life, showed the charity and magnanimity of the true follower of Christ.

The prison officials of Walla Walla, Wash., would be pleased to receive religious books and magazines for the use of the prisoners. There have been several notable conversions of convicts recently under the preaching of Prof. Allen P. Dow, of Whitman College, who has held regular services in the penitentiary during the past year, and there is an inquiry for Bibles, Testaments, and religious literature.

In a recent meeting Mrs. Ballington Booth said that the Volunteers have organized during the past eight months over two hundred posts. They have now four hundred commissioned officers. The Volunteers are taking special interest in the reforming of convicts. Mrs. Booth says that she believes that fully eighty per cent. of those who in prison profess conversion become, when released, respectable members of society.

Mr. Moody's appeal to the churches to hold evening services receives support from the statistics recently collected by the Northwestern Christian Advocate. In reply to queries addressed to churches in various cities 51 were received from New York, 75 from Philadelphia, 100 from Chicago, 37 from Brooklyn, 29 from Boston, and 23 from Washington. In every instance, the evening congregations are larger than those of the morning.

A settlement of college women is to be established for missionary work in the neighborhood of Bombay, India. The project is a development of the Student Volunteer Missionary Union. It is to be something like a deaconess institution for evangelistic, educational and medical work. Those who have projected the scheme are going themselves, chiefly at their own charges. Two are already in Bombay, and four are ready to sail soon.

Evangelistic services were held in Brooklyn, Eastern District, last week, in various churches. A council of ministers and Christian workers divided the city into districts and arranged for the holding of the meetings in one church of each group on the evening of each day. Every afternoon a united meeting for conference and Gospel song was held in some centrally situated church under the charge of Dr. A. C. Dixon, Dr. T. L. Cuyler, and other ministers.

The emancipation of the slaves in Madagascar caused some anxiety among the white residents, but it appears to have passed without the dreaded excesses. A missionary writes:—"Some of the slaves, we hear, behaved very badly, grossly insulting their mistresses. Still, the prevailing feeling among us is surprise that the great event has passed off so quietly. We used to plan in our minds various ways of branding about gradual emancipation, and here, by a stroke of the pen, the thing is done and the fetters are struck from about a million slaves."

Mr. D. L. Moody held two Services in Carnegie Music Hall, New York, on January 3d. The great building was densely crowded. More than a third of the congregation rose to ask for prayer in response to Mr. Moody's invitation. Mr. Moody strongly urged attendance at the meetings to be held in Cooper Union during the week, under the charge of Dr. A. C. Dixon and other ministers. He also pressed all to hear Rev. F. B. Meyer when he came to New York in February, and not to be offended if Mr. Meyer told them their faults, as he was sure to do. Referring to the Cooper Union Services, Mr. Moody said that after paying all expenses of the hall, printing and advertising, there was a balance of $722.26 left, which would be used in putting the Bible in prison cells.

AND THE NEWSPAPER

Flood and Landslides.

DISASTERS are reported from widely separated localities. Pictures of three of the districts which have suffered, appear on this page. The first is the beautiful Lake of Killarney in Ireland, one of the loveliest scenes in the world. Not far from the Lake is the town of Rathmore in the vicinity of which is an eminence about a thousand feet high known as Boy Hill. A part of the hill is of that soft nature which in Ireland is called a bog. It is a morass covered with a peculiar spongy growth known as peat, which, starting from decomposing vegetable matter, sends out new shoots and grows rapidly. The depth of a bog is in some instances as much as forty feet. The spongy mass shakes and quivers at the slightest pressure. A false step from the comparatively hard path through it which is usually marked by bushy "tussocks" rising above the surrounding vegetation, means a plunge into a quagmire in which a man sinks as in a quicksand. Sometimes the surface of the peat-bog has been known to rise two inches in a year. For some months past there have been heavy rains in the Killarney district, soaking the peat which gained enormously in weight. Meanwhile subterranean springs and streams were loosening the soil below. Suddenly, without any warning, the whole side of the hill began sliding down toward the valley. Gaining momentum as it moved, it swept downward with a roaring sound, carrying rocks, trees and everything before it for miles. In some places the path of the landslide was a mile wide, and as it moved along it buried everything, entirely changing the aspect of the section over which it passed. A cottage which stood in its way was entirely demolished and not a sign left to indicate where it had been. The occupier with his wife and seven children were carried away under the huge mass, and their bodies have not been found. Horses, cattle and farm implements disappeared before its resistless force. At latest accounts the bog is still moving toward the basin in which lies the beautiful Lake of Killarney. A second disaster is that reported from Greece. An inundation of the River Ilissos has submerged the suburbs of Athens. It was preceded by a terrific thunderstorm which worked fearful havoc in various parts of the Greek capital and in other towns in Attica. Athens was the worst sufferer, as the river having an insufficient outlet at Phalerum, rose to an unprecedented height and spread over the low-lying country. A train on the Peloponnesus Railroad was floated from the tracks. The engineer was killed, but the passengers fortunately escaped. Thirty-three lives were lost in Athens, some by drowning, and others by the fall of houses swept by the torrent from their foundations. The general alarm was increased by the prevailing darkness. The gas-works which supply the city with light were the first to suffer, and for several nights could not furnish gas. A third catastrophe is that reported from the Azores, the well-known group of islands off the coast of Portugal. The governor of the islands announces that a gigantic waterspout burst over the city of Povoaças in the Island of St. Michael, completely devastating the town. Tons of water fell, carrying away the homes of thousands of persons, and tearing a wide channel nine miles long through the most fertile district of the island. Three such calamities occurring within a few days of each other, would in former times have caused consternation, but in our days men look to science for an explanation. It is right that they should do so, if they do not forget the God of whom the prophet wrote:

For the Lord the God of hosts is he that toucheth the land, and it melteth and . . . he that calleth for the waters of the sea and poureth them out upon the face of the earth. (Amos 9: 3, 6.)

Sight Without Eyes.

Recent experiments with the Roentgen Rays open possibilities of wonders greater than have yet been witnessed. The most astonishing effect was that produced on a Boston scientist whose experience is described in the Hartford Times. Dr. J. R. Cocke lost his sight when he was only three weeks old, by the accidental application of acid to his eyes. From that time to the present this has been a dark world to him, so that although not actually born blind, he has never had the slightest conception of light or the appearance new light has led to the astonishing discovery that the brain has powers of vision independently of the eye. The existence of such powers in the brain was never suspected, although we have known on Apostolic authority that there is a sense in which the heart may see when it is not wilfully blinded.

Having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them because of the blindness of their heart. (Eph. 4: 18.)

Diseases of Gems.

A belief is current among jewelers that certain stones are as liable to disease as are human beings. Every jeweler who has kept a large stock has stories to tell of the unaccountable discoloration, fading, or darkening of pearls, rubies, topazes, or opals. Pearls frequently grow sick and develop blotches which destroy their value. A sick ruby loses its light and color, becomes lighter in tint and less brilliant. The topaz, on the other hand, becomes dark and muddy when its health fails. The opal is, however, the most delicate of all the gems and the one most susceptible to disease. Its prismatic colors are said to be due to minute cracks in the body of the stone, the edges of which reflect the light at different angles and give the varied tints for which the opal is admired. When the opal becomes sick, it is liable to split in pieces. The cracks which give it beauty, open and the stone separates into two or more fragments. The diseases of all these stones were mysteries until modern times. Science has solved some of them now as it has so many other mysteries. The diseases of the ruby and the topaz are not diseases at all, but are merely the consequence of a prolonged exposure to a strong light. The disruption of the opal, is due to the fact that its chief constituent is a combination of silicic must be some subterranean passage-way, for the evaporation would not dispose of the rain and melted snow with which its waters are supplied. Prof. Diller, who has thoroughly studied the geologic formation of the mountain, believes that it was once fifteen thousand feet high and was filled with seething lava. The intense heat and frequent eruptions, of which signs remain in the congealed lava of the whole district, he believes, weakened and undermined the sides of the mountain, until the shell was too weak to support the gigantic weight of the cone, and nine thousand feet of it fell into the hollow of the earth. Since that convulsion, which occurred in some remote age, there has apparently been no eruption, and the lake has gradually formed in the basin which was once full of seething, molten fire. It would seem that there has been a literal precedent, if Prof. Diller's theory is correct, for the figure under which God threatens the destruction of those that oppose his will:

I am against thee, O destroying mountain that destroyest the earth, and I will stretch out mine hand upon thee, and roll thee down from the rocks, and will make thee a burnt mountain. (Jer. 51: 25.)

A Farm-hand's Romance.

The death of an aged man who had worked all his life as a farm-hand in Fulton county, Pa., brought to light a romantic story. It appears that early in the century a thirteen-year-old boy was one of the passengers on board an emigrant ship which arrived at Philadelphia from Ireland. The boy's passage had not been paid, and in accordance with the custom of the time he was offered for sale to farmers for a term of years. The farmer who bid the highest price was allowed to have the boy until his earnings were sufficient to repay the farmer the price paid to the owners of the ship for him. The boy's story was that he was heir to a title and large estates, but on his father's death, his uncle had smuggled him on board ship and had deserted him. His story was not believed, until two Irishmen, several years later, spent a night on the farm. They came from County Wexford and they knew the boy. They reported that his uncle had circulated a story of his death, and had succeeded to the title and estates as next heir. They offered to return home with the rightful heir and testify in his behalf, but until the farmer's claim was satisfied he was not allowed to go. He worked until he attained his majority, and having fallen in love with the farmer's daughter, he stayed on to win the father's consent to their marriage. Afterwards, aided by some lawyers in Philadelphia, he went to London and instituted a suit to recover his rights. The process of law was slow, the uncle was in possession and knew how to make use of his vast wealth to thwart his nephew's efforts. Before he could secure a judgment in the Irish court of last resort, he died. In the meantime a son had been born to him in this country, but neither the mother nor the grandfather of the babe, who were of Dutch extraction, knew how to prosecute his claims, and before he was of an age to understand them and press them for himself, too long an interval had elapsed, the witnesses had disappeared, and a suit would have been hopeless. The child grew up on the farm and continued to be a farm-hand until his death a few days ago. One cannot but be sorry that he and his father should have lost the title and estates which rightly belonged to them. It may be hoped that they have not missed the heavenly inheritance which God offers to all who seek it. No fraud could keep them from it; though they might lose it as so many do by their own fault.

Let us, therefore, give diligence to enter into that rest that no man fall after the same example of disobedience. (Heb. 12: 4.)

of things. But his other senses have developed to marvelous acuteness. He can tell the exact dimensions of a room by sound and can describe accurately by touch the figures on a fabric that he handles. He succeeded in working his way through college, by an occupation in which delicacy of touch was essential, and his marvelously retentive memory enabled him to retain the lectures he heard. He has been a diligent student, and is now an acknowledged authority in chemistry and nervous diseases. The wonders of the Roentgen Rays had a personal interest for him, and a few days ago he devised a test in his own person. He directed that the most powerful tube in existence should be used, and he seated himself beneath it at a distance of four feet, and in a position which brought the rays on the top of his head. When the rays were turned on he had a strange indescribable sensation which ceased when they were turned off. A pair of pliers held above his head, between it and the light, were distinctly perceptible to him, and he described them minutely and accurately, and when they were put in his hands he recognized them at once. Letters cut in a sheet of tin foil he also described. A hand held over his head was also recognized, and he was able to tell when it was turned flat or edgewise. Held at the side and the back of his head he perceived it too, but the impression was more vague than when held above his head. If these facts are as reported, the acid, with a tenth to a seventh of water. Exposure to heat causes the water to evaporate and disintegration ensues. If these facts had been known earlier, many people would have saved gems worth large sums which they lost, as they supposed by disease. It is not so, however, with the souls of God's children, which are his jewels. We are assured that he knew them thoroughly from the beginning and they will be kept intact and undimmed to the last:

And they shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels. (Mal. 3: 17.)

A Lake in a Crater.

The most wonderful lake in this hemisphere, and in some of its features the most wonderful in the world, is described in a recent publication by Professor J. S. Diller, of the United States Geological Survey. The lake is in the crater of an extinct volcano, in the Cascade Mountain Range of Southern Oregon. The lake is over six thousand feet above the level of the sea; it is about six miles in diameter, and is nearly circular in shape. The water is intensely blue, and is fully two thousand feet deep. It has no known outlet, but there is ground for believing that there

Questions and Answers.

IN last week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD it was announced that no more copies of Marion Harland's famous book, "The Home of the Bible," could be supplied. It should have been explained that this notice was designed to refer only to those who might send in new subscriptions. A sufficient number of copies of "The Home of the Bible" has been reserved to supply all of our old subscribers who on renewing their subscriptions may designate that book as the premium of their choice. It is our invariable policy, as far as possible, to make provision for our old subscribers.

Several Readers. We cannot fill any more orders for "Gospel Hymns," our stock having been entirely exhausted.

Sunday School Teacher, Cleveland, O. Was the miracle of the tongues worked on the Apostles at Pentecost (Acts 2: 6-12)? Does not the narrative imply that the people who heard them speak were the subjects of the miracle?

The reasonable supposition is that each apostle had command of one or more languages, not that two persons of different nationalities listening to the same preacher at the same time were both able to understand him. Peter's explanation (Acts 2: 13-18) shows distinctly that it was upon the apostles that the miracle was worked, not upon their hearers.

I. N., Danville, Ind. 1. Can a woman, having property in her own name, lawfully will it to her own children, leaving her husband nothing, he already being well provided for? 2. Could such a will be broken?

As the laws affecting inheritance and the rights of married women vary greatly in different States, the safest way is to consult some reputable lawyer in your own State. Lay advice in such questions is an unsafe guide.

H. M. N., Jura, Ont. Is it right to invite those who are sinners to Sunday School, to play an instrument, in company with the singing?

It would be a difficult and possibly an unwise policy to attempt to exclude from church and Sunday School choirs all but converts; still, due discretion should be exercised in selecting those who are to render instrumental or vocal music at religious services, or to take any prominent part. A notoriously immoral person would be an offense to many.

P. T. L., Syracuse, N. Y. 1. How many countries are represented by the explorers who have gone in search of the North Pole; what are their names, and the names of the explorers? 2. Who built the Great Pyramid, what was it built for, in what year was it opened, and is it true that by using the entrance passage, as you would a telescope, the Draconius, or true polar star, was in a direct line of vision 2170 B. C.? 3. Is it in any way a prophetic building?

1. Almost all the countries of Europe and our own as well are represented in these expeditions, thus far, the principal explorers being Willoughby, Chancellor, Burrough, Pet, Fishburner, Davis, Hudson, Baffin, Fox, Scoresby, Behring, Cook, Barrow, Franklin, Ross, McClure, Grinnell, Kane, Hayes, Hall, Payer, Petermann, Weyprecht, Nordenskjöld, Nares, Schwatka, De Long, Greely, Peary, and Nansen. 2. The Great Pyramid of Gizeh is believed from certain inscriptions to have been founded by Shufu I. (B. C. 2178-2186). It was designed as a royal sepulchre. The astronomical theory of its form and structure is held by many, but it is incapable, at this distant date of being established beyond dispute. 3. The same remark applies to the last question.

O. I. Subscriber, Troy, N. Y. Who were "the spirits in prison" to whom Christ is described (1 Peter 3: 19) as going and preaching?

Several explanations of this mysterious passage have been suggested. The one most widely accepted is that they were the antediluvians, as mentioned in the next verse. It is not necessary to suppose that Christ descended into the abode of the lost spirits and there preached. Peter may have meant that Christ preached to them in their lifetime through the testimony of Noah, as a minister speaking of a number of his flock who had been sent to prison might say that he had preached to that man in prison, meaning that he had preached to him before he went to prison.

D. B. M., Fort Wayne. In reading the book "Ivanhoe" by Walter Scott, I find the following on page 178, the popular tradition places the number of slain babies in Bethlehem at 10,000, yet it is also there remarkable that more than a score were slaughtered, and it is still more curious that with the facts and conditions to believe that the number did not exceed a dozen. Canon Farrar in his book "The Prince of Glory" (on page 178) says: "The probable number of the innocents has been extraordinarily exaggerated considering that Bethlehem was but a village of two thousand inhabitants, we may safely hope that even in all its boundaries not more than twenty male children were sacrificed and perhaps not half that number." My Bible says (Matt. 2: 16): "That Herod sent forth and slew all the children that were in Bethlehem and in all the coasts thereof from two years old and under." Now where do they find authority for saying that only male children were slain in Bethlehem and in all the coasts thereof, and consequently only a small number, perhaps not more than ten or a dozen were slain?

As the actual number is uncertain, the various authors are entitled to their different estimates. That only male children were slain is a natural inference.

Reader, Brooklyn, N. Y. What does the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews refer to by laying aside every weight (Hebrews 12: 1)?

The allusion is to the races and athletic contests of the Olympian games. He is trying to stimulate Christians to strive after the higher

The parable was a reproof to such persons, but it also conveyed a weighty lesson as to the evil of sin. Although the father forgave his younger son and gave him joyful welcome, he said to the elder, "All that I have is thine," thereby intimating that the younger son's lost patrimony could not be restored. The sinner is urged to repent, and is promised pardon, but the time he has wasted, and the health he has injured, and the mischief his example has done, are irreparable evils.

It is 12 1/2 geographical miles in length, and about 6 in breadth—equal to 16 by 7 1/2 Roman miles.

S. S. Teacher, Brooklyn, N. Y. Is anything known of the mother of David?

No; the history gives no clue to her identity. It has been suggested that Nahash (mentioned in Samuel 17: 15) may have been her name, but the probabilities are against it. Nahash is a man's name, though it may have been given to a woman. Scholars are of opinion, from the construction of the Hebrew text, that the Abigail and Zeruiah, spoken of as daughters of Nahash and sisters of David, were the daughters of David's mother by a former marriage to a man of the name of Nahash. The reference to them in 1 Chron. 2: 16 appears to imply that they were not daughters of Jesse.

R. M., Pottsville, Pa. I see by the New York newspapers that the Sunday press has come in for a considerable share of attention from the pulpit lately. What is Mr. Moody's position in this respect?

Mr. Moody has placed himself on record, recently, as saying: "I would not touch a Sunday paper any more than I would touch tar. They have done more to demoralize the church of God than anything else."

H. A. G., Brooklyn, N. Y. During a conversation the assertion was made that the Church of Rome has had female Popes. The fact being doubted even by an editor of a religious weekly, I appeal to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a full statement of their names and dates.

Although the Roman Church denies it, some early historians have asserted that at one time in the ninth century the Papal chair was filled by a woman—the "Popess Joan." This personage is mentioned by Marianus Scotus, a monk of Fulda, who lived about 1040-1080, and who, in his chronicle, says that when Leo IV. died, in 853, he was succeeded by Joan, whose pontificate lasted two years, five months and four days, she in turn being succeeded by Benedict III. Anastasius and Hincmar, both contemporary with Leo IV., in writing of the succession, make no mention of any occupant of the Papal chair between Leo and Benedict.

Mrs. C. C., Wis. How long did it take Noah to build the Ark, and where in the Bible is it stated?

See Genesis 6: 3. The accepted interpretation of the passage is that the 120 years were allotted as a period of warning before the Flood, to afford an opportunity for the race to repent.

Constant Reader, New Haven, Conn. Is there any way of finding out what was the number of the people who left Egypt under the command of Moses, and what was the number that entered the Promised Land?

Not exactly. The number of adults over twenty years of age who left Egypt is stated in Exodus 12: 37, at about six hundred thousand. Allowing the normal proportion of children to such a host we should infer that the total number was about two millions. Three centuries later, when they were at Sinai, a more careful count was made and the number is then given (Ex. 38: 26) at 603,550. Two years later another census was taken and the number is stated (Num. 2: 32) at exactly the same figure, but as the Levites were not included and there were 22,000 of them, we may assume that by that time the adults numbered about 625,000. Thirty-eight years later, immediately after a pestilence had swept away large numbers and just before entering Canaan another census was taken. The figures are given (Numbers 26: 21) as 601,730, which shows a slight decrease. Of these only two—Joshua and Caleb—were left of the adult who crossed the Red Sea.

A STREET "UNDER THE FORT" IN MONTREAL, CANADA.

At the present time, our Canadian friends are in the midst of the usual winter recreations, and most of their cities are clad in a snowy mantle. Every winter, Montreal attracts numerous visitors on account of the festivities that are held there at that season. Its winter carnivals, ice palaces, vast toboggan slides and snow-shoe chibs have long been famous. Our photograph, taken before the winter set in, shows a historic part of the quaint old Canadian city—a street below the famous fortress on the heights of Mount Royal, from which the city derives its name.

attainments of the Christian faith. Every believer has some special and peculiar hindrance to his progress. When he is saved by faith in Christ, he should endeavor to reach perfection. If his mind is set on wealth, or if there is some indulgence which he is fond of, which divides his attention and prevents him concentrating his energies on higher spiritual attainments, he should lay it aside. It may not be sinful, but if it is a hindrance, it should be given up by one who is striving to rise. Though it be harmless, it may be a weight which must not be carried by one who is running the heavenly race.

Robt. M., Newburgh, N. Y. I am told that the dates in the margin of our Bibles are unreliable. Is it possible to fix approximately such dates as the birth of Abraham and Moses and the entry into Canaan?

Secular history shows that the accession of Saul was about the year B. C. 1094. For dates prior to that time there are two systems of reckoning. One of these fixes the period of the Judges at 334 years and the other at 500. As the reckoning is made backward, this difference affects all previous dates. According

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

The Bearing of Trouble.

I AM looking out of the window at a most beautiful snow-storm. It began last night. I heard the wind blowing great guns, and driving the sleet against the rattling windows, and I thought with pity of the motormen standing in the freezing cold, and guiding the sleigh-cars with the flakes dashing in their faces, of the sailors along our perilous coast, and the ships that were fighting their way in the teeth of the icy gale, of the blizzard piling itself up and stopping the railway trains. Then I fell asleep to a dream of summer and roses.

All day the snow has fallen steadily. It has bit it has heaped the street up in front of my door, and now it has blocked all of the basement windows, and it reminds me of the snows we had when I was a child. In latter years we have had great snow-storms near my home, but I remember going to school through banks of snow as high as my head, and ever since then I have loved the feathery flakes as they fly before the wind.

This storm was coming on all yesterday; the air was keen, and here, near the window, it cut you like a knife. I went with a friend to make a call in the afternoon, and we shivered under our furs and had to walk very fast to keep warm. But we were glad there was the prospect of a good-fashioned snow-fall.

In my childhood we had not begun to keep Christmas as everybody does now. The first day of the year was the great day, when presents were given to the children and exchanged between their elders, when friends went from house to house making calls and wishing each other a happy new year.

We used to care a great deal about the "first foot" over the threshold on New Year's morning. It was pleasant to have the first visitor cheery and beautiful and fair. Somehow the year began best if the "first foot" was that of a caller who brought good will and beauty into the house.

Thinking of this, as my mind wandered over the many homes of my CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, I knew that to some of them the New Year would not bring unalloyed satisfaction. Few years do. And now and then a year must come to all of us freighted with care and worry and disappointment, perhaps with heart-break and sorrow.

We call the bearing of prosperity easy. We think anyone can meet joy, but how about the bearing of grief? Dear mother, with your heart forever moaning as you moans on the harbor bar, how are you going to bear the desolation which came to you with that grave where your darling sleeps?

"Into each life some rain must fall, some days must be dark and dreary," sooner or later to every one of us comes trial.

There is no flock, however watched and tended, But one dead lamb is there; There is no household, howsoever defended, But has one vacant chair!

Pardon me for telling you, dear friend, that there is a Christian way and there is a right way of meeting and bearing trouble. The former accepts it as God's appointment, grieves over it, for "he knoweth our infirmities and in all our affliction he is afflicted," but tries to look above it to the heaven where the loved one has gone. The heaven of the living, not of the dead. The heaven that is the Father's house. The heaven where nothing can any more touch or vex or disturb those who are safe within its gates.

This triumphant uplooking of the Christian means that she, if it be a woman who suffering the pangs of bereavement, will think how best to help others who are sorrowing. The snow which is to-day falling on so many graves in God's acre, is not hither than the robes the ransomed wear. We are going home to our beloved, and one day we shall find our lost ones all at the feast in the Lord's presence. So, let us bravely bear trouble, and help our fellow-pilgrims on the road home.

I have just finished reading a very lovely book, a son's tribute to an adored mother. I read it with tear-dimmed eyes, for it brought my own mother very near to me, though she has long been at rest from this troublesome world. In the book there is the glory of a home, simple, plain, God-fearing—a home at times of poverty, and never a home, at its best estate, of wealth. But oh! the confidence, the tenderness, the loyalty, the loving sacrifices of that small Scottish home!

To homes as deeply pious, as full of wholesome affection, of the family bond, of the love of God, this paper goes every week. In them are the young getting ready for life, the middle-aged in the thick of the fight, the old, whose day is almost ended.

And to all of them I wish, my hand in theirs, my love going forth to them, probably nothing like this in all the world save possibly in the mountains and jungles of the tropical regions. Rainfall is so copious, vegetation so luxuriant and decay so slow that the forests are like one vast heap of logs, trees and undergrowth. It costs several hundred dollars to clear an acre of ground, and it is of no particular value when cleared, save for raising a few garden vegetables and watery tubers, like turnips, radishes, carrots, and such things. None of the cereals will ripen on account of the cool summers and lack of sunshine.

IN these days, when good people all over the civilized world are exchanging greetings of love and affection, and when the poor of our own land are being generously remembered by those who have comfortable homes and incomes, it must bring a feeling of sadness to many hearts to learn of the pitiful plight of the orphan children of Armenia. Missionaries in Asiatic Turkey write us that there are over 50,000 children of tender years, who have been deprived of parents and guardians by the recent massacres. This vast kingdom at heart to help this movement, and the opportunity so afforded should be seized before it passes away forever.

Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are familiar with the story of the massacres, which have been fully described in these pages by eye-witnesses and others. But the mind shudders at the contemplation of the fate which awaits the orphan children of Armenia—a fate beside which even death seems merciful. Several weeks ago a remittance was made from our American Relief Fund for the purpose of aiding the missionaries in caring for the orphans. This week $1,000 has been cabled from the fund to Miss Corinna Shattuck, the missionary of the American Board at Oorfa, where there is a great multitude of destitute orphan children—more probably than in any other city of Anatolia. We have asked Miss Shattuck, by cable, to apply this sum at once to the relief of as many Armenian orphans as she can arrange to feed, clothe and shelter, and should the result of our inquiries warrant it, further aid will be sent from the Fund to Oorfa, with the view of affording substantial aid in a quarter that seems to be the neediest of all. We feel confident that our friends, knowing these facts, will cordially support the effort for the rescue of these innocent children, now orphaned and friendless. It is a new and unexpected phase of the great work of Armenian charity.

Miss Corinna Shattuck, whom we have specially requested to oversee this work of orphan rescue, is one of the most experienced missionaries in Asia Minor. She it was who, when the great massacre occurred at Oorfa, stood as the heroic protector of the young students of the American mission school there. We are assured that she is as ready and willing to serve in any movement for the aid of the orphans of Oorfa now as she was ready and willing to risk her own life in behalf of the young students at the mission, in the time of their peril.

Our photograph on this page shows a group of orphan boys of Cesarea and vicinity. At Oorfa there is a very large number of orphans, and the need there is greater than at any other point in Armenia.

The remittance of $1,000 to Oorfa is the eleventh weekly remittance of $1,000, and with previous amounts sent to the Armenian field, makes the total disbursements from the Fund for relief purposes, to date, $53,000. The following contributions were received during the past week:

Alaska's Bleakness.

A less promising picture of any country could hardly have been drawn than this remarkably frank description of Alaska, by The North Star, a paper published there:

There is nothing to induce the laboring man, the merchant, mechanic or professional man to migrate to Alaska. Hundreds and even thousands seeking employment have come to Alaska during the past season only to be doomed to disappointment. Aside from the enjoyment and pleasure of the trip, there is absolutely nothing here to induce any one seeking employment or location for business enterprises to turn his face toward Alaska. It is a bleak, mountainous, almost uninhabitable region covered with swamps and impenetrable forests. It is only about twenty-five miles across this, Baranoff island, and yet we have never known of any one who has crossed the island overland. The dense primeval forests, the mountains, the swamps and the tundra render an overland passage almost impossible. There is multitude of little orphan girls and boys are innocent victims of tyrannical Moslem rule, and unless the Christian world stretches out its protecting hand to shelter and care for them, they must inevitably meet the fate common to all waifs who are abandoned in Mussulman lands. They will be taken into Moslem homes in the capacity of slaves, they will receive Mohammedan names, and their recollections of Christian parents and friends will be effaced as completely as though they had never known any other than Moslem surroundings. Worst of all, they will be proselytized to the Mohammedan faith, and Mohammed will usurp the place Jesus has occupied in their young hearts. They will be taught the infamous doctrines of the Koran, and will learn to despise the name of Christ, and to hate his followers. That this is the universal fate of all children who fall into Turkish hands, past experience has abundantly proved.

It is not, therefore, surprising that the Christian world, roused to action by such an appalling prospect, should have bestowed itself to save these helpless little ones. Already a movement has begun looking to the establishment of Christian orphanages, under missionary auspices, in a number of the cities of Anatolia, but the field is so vast that it will require a superhuman effort to accomplish any substantial result. Yet the children must be saved to Christianity! It is the duty of every one who has the cause of Christ's

THE KING'S HIGHWAY

A STORY OF THE BROADER CHRIST-LIFE

WRITTEN SPECIALLY FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

BY AMELIA E. BARR.

CHAPTER IV—Continued A STRANGE DINNER PARTY.

"HE had such a happy, careless, up-head manner," continued Jessie, "such kind, thoughtful ways. His eyes were full of light and laughter; and if I speak the truth, I must say that I loved away myself in one short hour; yes, in one short minute. And I confess, moreover, that I never was so happy in my life. It was joy to be in his presence; and even when he was gone away, the sense of the delight remained."

"How I envy you, Jessie!" said Alice.

"That night I said to myself, 'Love is not our choice, it is our fate.' Afterwards, I brought reason to my condition; for I feel pretty sure, Love only conquers, when we dare not, or will not, reason with him."

"But, oh, why wish to conquer, or to reason away so sweet an experience? If I could feel such love, I would give up everything for it; that is, if the man who inspired it was a good man; and worthy of a good woman's love."

"I doubt it. You would think of what people might say. Your prospective title already fills your imagination. Your wedding, and your wedding dresses, have become familiar thoughts. Your talk is very much of the English Court, and of English Society; and if your one true lover was now to appear, and he was a poor man, you would feel it as hard to accept him as I find it difficult to accept Steve Morrison, with all the uncertainties of his position."

"I might. I am not sure—for I know not Love. Still, I have a presentiment that I shall never marry Lord Medway—why, I cannot tell. Do you believe in presentiments?"

"I see no reason for not doing so. A good man or a good woman is allied to the heavenly intelligences—only a little lower than the angels. Why should they not be informed and impressed by their allies? I have a presentiment that I shall in the end marry Steve; and yet my reason is against it. What does Mrs. Lloyd think about your marriage with Lord Medway?"

"She is very much opposed to it. She does not wish me to go so far away from her. Father says —"

At that moment the door opened, and Mr. Lloyd entered the room. He was much pleased to find Jessie there, and said, "I was going to write a few lines to your brother, and tell him how much I approved his last paper in The Forum. It was a lucid and forcible argument. I should like to have a conversation with him. Can he dine with me on Monday? Tell him I shall have two or three gentlemen present who are of his way of thinking."

"I will give John your message, sir. I am sure he will be pleased to accept your invitation."

This courtesy made quite an excitement in the McAslin home. Mrs. McAslin thought, "Nicholas still remembers. He favors my children, because he has not forgotten the old days." John thought, "Mr. Lloyd is a sensible man. He may be covetous and selfish, but on the financial aspect of national affairs he holds sound opinions." Mr. McAslin said with some pride, "Well, children, we may not be rich, but the McAslins are of the best blood in Scotland. If we look back on our history, John is like a page out of a romance—my page has been but a dull and difficult one, but who can tell what adventures and what good fortune may come to John?"

If John had any presentiment of an adventure, he kept it still in his heart; and when Monday arrived, prepared for his visit with an air of real, or affected unconcern. He said, it was "unfortunate Jessie could not go with him," and Jessie answered: "Monday is the one impossible day in the week for me. I have pupils until after the last train for Lloyd's station, that is available for the dinner hour—and pupils are of more importance than a social entertainment; so you will have to go without my protection, John."

When we cross the threshold of a strange house, it is always an event to be noticed. Nothing of perceptible importance may follow; and again, our footsteps may be full of fate, and leading us on a road from which there is no return. John crossed the Lloyd threshold with every feeling held in abeyance, and yet at tight tension. He knew nothing of the ground he was on; but he was alert, and watchful of himself; and in that neutral mood of equipoise, which is ready to accommodate itself to whatever is pleasant and equally ready to repel whatever is antagonistic.

Mr. Lloyd met him cordially. He had two gentlemen with him, Mr. Moran a wealthy capitalist, and Max Lehman a fiery advocate of Karl Marx's opinions. They soon fell into a lively discussion, and John was particularly interested in Max Lehman. He had heard of him often. He was associated, in his mind, with East-side sweating shops and Trades halls, and all other places where dissatisfied labor congregated. The argument, dropped for a few moments at John's entrance, was soon renewed.

"I am for the transfer of land and capital and of all the material and instruments of production from the individual to the state. The government ought to organize labor," said Lehman, curtly.

"If the government organized labor," answered Mr. Moran, "it would soon come to a square fight between the government and the working classes, that is if they imposed upon the government, as some do upon their present employers."

"They would not impose on the government. They would be willing that the government should hold property that they are not willing to have in private hands. Proudhon's famous saying that property is robbery, is not far from the truth."

"I admire your frankness, Mr. Lehman," said Lloyd. "You would then do away with capitalists?"

"It was understood that I was to speak frankly when I accepted your invitation. As for capitalists, yes, I would do away with them; they are by no means necessary adjuncts to capital. In every good business there is a surplus value. This surplus is produced by the laborer, but it is intercepted by the capitalist, who gets it without paying for it. State organization would do away with this element of personal selfishness and aggrandizement."

"Mr. Lehman," said John, "there is more than one kind of labor in any good business. You are supposing that there is only one kind—that of the hands. You are leaving out of account altogether that of the head. The inventor, the improver of processes, the discoverer of new markets, the whole work of management and direction, is paid for out of surplus values, and this mental work fully earns its payment. Without head work there would be little hand work, and one class of workers are as worthy of payment as the other."

"That is right," said Mr. Lloyd.

"Besides," continued John, "it is very doubtful if the government would be any more liberal than the capitalist. Under present circumstances it gets its work done at the very lowest figure possible. How are you going to prevent buyers buying in the cheapest market?"

"Legislation, sir, will —"

"Legislation, Mr. Lehman," said John, "is out of the question. It is as much beyond legislation as are the fogs of the Atlantic. You cannot kill the capitalist goose, and retain the income of the golden eggs. Say that legislation equalizes capital to-day, who would make capital for the needs of the future. Men are not bees; if their honey was taken as soon as their hives were full, they would cease to make honey."

"The state would then take the place of the capitalist."

"No state could take the place of that great band of capitalists who, at this hour, are sustaining the industries of the country."

"It is a false condition. We want a fairer division of wealth. Capital and property are fatal to the equal rights of men. All should be equally well off."

"But to make all equally well off we shall have to vastly increase production. How is this to be done?"

"Organization—communism—the diffusion of power will lead to the diffusion of wealth."

At this point a servant announced dinner, and the gentlemen rose, but as they went to the dining room, the conversation was continued—"yes, sir, organization and suffrage, as an experiment, if it fails —"

"What then?"

"We will try communism. Property is fatal to equality."

"Communism is fatal to liberty."

They were just within the door as John uttered the words. They fell from his lips with a force and conviction that left on his handsome face a very becoming dignity, and the next moment a beautiful woman stood before him. His eyes caught her eyes, and then Mr. Lloyd introduced his daughter to John. Both went through the same strange, vivid experience, but what it meant neither of them at the time knew or cared. They had simply found each other. The recognition was instantaneous; the greeting mutually happy and free from doubt; the influence on both distinctly exhilarating. Mr. Lloyd perceived nothing unusual in this meeting; the mystical mother was clearer-eyed. She saw in both faces a fine intangible revealing of something not yet known to themselves; she saw it in their smiles, and in the quick, wide opening of their eyes, for the eyes are ever the leaders in love.

"This is the beginning of some predestined end," she thought; and through all the clash of contradiction and assertion she watched John with an interest he was quite unconscious of.

A conversation so absorbing to a parties could not be long interrupted by minor subjects. Mr. Lloyd praised his fine wines, as if their possession was a personal merit; but that subject raised little enthusiasm; and Max Lehman quickly returned to his Communistic dreams. Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Moran put in occasional denials of his position, but John listened until the German Socialist had exhausted his argument. Then he spoke with a calm decision that had in it no element of fear or doubt.

"The destruction of capital and the transfer of land to the government—then, is what you want! But these things mean pillage, bloodshed, national mass, misery and ruin, not only to the rich and to the middle class, but most intractably of all, to the poor. To teach the ignorant, the lazy, and the criminal that their property is plundered from them by the manufacturer and the capitalist is to turn partial distress into universal catastrophe."

"In the midst of so much poverty and wrong, are we to sit still and do nothing?" John McAslin asked Lehman passionately.

"God forbid!" John answered with equal fervor. "There is work enough for all to do. But is it not better to cut the causes than to dally over effects?"

"That is what the Socialists desire to do."

"No; they flatter or they madden the audiences. They do not dare to tell that a great deal of their misery is caused by their own laziness and vice. Their harangue against the sins and self-indulgence of the rich; they have not the courage to point out the sins and vices of the poor—their thriftlessness, their carelessness, their early and improvident marriages, and above all, their drunkenness."

"They are no worse than others."

"They profess to be better, and they are not, and you know they are not. The poor clergyman and the poor clerk are thrifty. In many cases they make more than the skilled workman, yet they bring up their families decently and within their narrow means. When wages are high do the working classes save for bad time? No, they are not only extravagant, they are wasteful. They do seem to realize that luxury and extravagance are as bad in the poor as in the rich. In the middle classes a man does not marry until he can support a wife and family; a laborer will marry on a dollar, take his wife into squalid, crowded rooms, and bring into the world such starved, wretched children as, in the terrible language of South are 'not so much born as damned into the world.' But drunkenness is the master fiend of their poverty and distress; and drunkenness is in itself a whole world of sin. If there was no other sin, it would be sufficient to bring us every calamity. Communism will make the poor man thrifty, self-denying and sober; on the contrary, it would increase his extravagance and self-indulgence and intemperance."

"At any rate, it would be well to try the effect of more money and more leisure on him."

"You have not considered that there is a destiny in riches, and that they are beyond our control. Riches do not come by chance or by accident. And I, for one, do not consider the possession of great wealth an enviable condition. No thoughtful man would do so."

"For what reason?" asked Mr. Lloyd.

"Because of the responsibility attached to it—a responsibility not to be shirked and for which there will be a strict accounting. Wealth is blessed and honorable, when the holders of it understand that they are the stewards of it, and not the owners. God gives wealth to be employed in good and great deeds."

"But if rich men add million to million for their own glory and pleasure, what then Mr. McAslin?"

It was Mrs. Lloyd who asked this question, and her soft, even voice, had a singular thrilling quality. It penetrated, as if rain penetrates the earth; and there was a moment's silent pause ere John answered —

"You have doubtless read, Ma, what St. James says of such men. 'Go to now, ye rich men, weep and howl for your miseries that shall come upon you. Your riches are rotted, and your garments are eaten.'"

Success and Failure.
Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week beginning Jan. 24. Luke 5: 1-11.

LIFE is full both of failures and successes. They do not alternate but frequently follow in a series, disconcerting and surprising us as they find us unprepared for them. To the unthinking, the experiences like luck, or fatality, something uncountable, which must be endured with such equanimity as we can command. Enterprises commenced under excellent auspices, and in the most propitious circumstances encounter unexpected obstacles and end disastrously; while some adventure that seems fanatical and foredoomed to failure, achieves success. It is so, too, in our spiritual experience. There is no time when there is so much danger of falling into sin, or of yielding to temptation, as when there is self-confidence and elation, and there is no time when we are so safe as when dangers menace and we are distrustful of ourselves and conscious of the possibility of falling. Reviewing any past period of life, without holding a clue, we are apt to think of God as capricious and to become dispirited as to the future. But nothing can be further from the truth. God, like a wise father, is teaching us by every failure and by every triumph, but we do not always understand and too often we feel resentment instead of making an earnest, humble effort to learn the lesson. The Psalmist said to the people of his day, "Be ye not as the horse or as the mule which have no understanding, whose trappings must be bit and bridle to hold them in, else they will not come near unto thee," and he might have said the same to us with equal propriety. The bit and bridle are needed and sometimes the spur has to be applied, because we have not brought the problem of the intelligence and the penetration we bring to business matters. It is worthy of notice, too, that we do not always recognize our failures and our successes, when we see them. The writer of Ecclesiastes describes a succession of such failures. He evidently succeeded in getting the wealth and power and knowledge and fame and pleasure that he sought. So far, his efforts were successful, but they were a failure in the end, and he had to admit, "This also is vanity." God was letting him try experiments and giving him the largest measure of the things he strove to attain, that he might learn once for all that the good he wanted was not in them. So it is in the experience of the modern Christian at times. When he has set his heart on a thing, God will sometimes answer his prayers by giving success to his efforts to obtain it, and has allowed him to learn by painful experience that it is not the blessing he believed it to be. Thus if he is wise he learns, too, not to dictate to his Heavenly Father that it is best for him to have, and henceforth prays only that God will give him what he in his wisdom deems it best that he should have.

Many and various are the lessons we may learn, if we will, from both our successes and our failures, but the one general principle, the key to more of them than we often realize, is that which the disciples learned, as described in the passage associated with the Topic. Alone, they had piloted all night without taking anything, but with Christ in the vessel, and acting at his command, they had so much success that they could not gather it without help. It is in union with Christ, in association with him that all our power comes. In our own spiritual life, and in our attempts at service, this result all depends on whether Christ is in the ship, whether he is directing us and whether we are following our own devices or are saying, "Nevertheless at thy word, I will let down the net." It is when the preacher depends on his own eloquence, when the worker is depending on his own test, when the young Christian is so sure of himself that he does not avoid temptation, that failure comes. Success is achieved when there is close contact with Christ in faith and prayer. From him alone comes strength to resist evil and power for service. In some way, uncomprehensible to us, Christ unparts both.

The Lord's Coming.
What the Scriptures Teach as to its Manner and Time.
BY REV. CAPEL MOLYNEAUX, B. A.

IT is clear that the time of the advent, relatively considered, will be, when Israel's trouble closes; when Anti-christ's work is done; and when the Gospel shall be preached throughout the world as a witness; then Christ will come, but not till then. Christ comes to put an end to the tribulation of Israel; but Israel's tribulation, though consummated only in Antichrist's time, began, as the Lord testifies (Luke 21), at the destruction of Jerusalem. This tribulation, has, therefore, continued from that day to this, and will yet continue till the advent. How then can there be a millennium, a state of universal blessedness, prior to the advent? All in reference to Israel at least, is, and is to be, tribulation, till the advent. Nor is it otherwise predicted of the world at large; the tares and wheat are to grow together in the field (which is the world) until the harvest; good and evil to co-exist throughout the whole dispensation; and the mystery of iniquity, which by Paul's testimony, wrought in his days, is, according to the same authority, to continue to work, until it shall resolve into its consummation—"the man of sin,"—and be destroyed by the Lord's advent.

Thus, trouble and evil, and iniquity are to exist and prevail, and at best be mixed up with their contrasts, throughout the whole period, from the ascension of Christ till his return; and equally plain is it also, therefore, that no place for a millennium can be found during the same. Hence it is observable, as might be expected, that the Gospels, which especially refer to the present dispensation, and the epistles as well, make no mention of the millennium. They speak of the world as it is, and as it is to continue; of the righteous and the wicked, of their states respectively, and their end; and of the advent as closing this age; but not of the millennium, just because it has nothing to do with this closing age; it belongs to another age, to which they point, but of which, except as preparing the world for it, they say little. The only passage where the millennium, or the age of blessedness, is distinctly referred to, is in Matt. 19: 28: "Verily, I say unto you, That ye which have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of Man shall sit on the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." And here, in accordance with what I have above shown, and with Scripture everywhere, the regeneration state, or the new state, the millennial time, is represented as consequent on the advent, contemporaneous with the session of the Son of Man on the throne of his glory, and with the reign of the apostles over the twelve tribes of Israel in the restoration.

Since believers in all ages and generations are bidden to be ready and look for the Lord, then it follows, and must be believed, that in any age or generations, the Lord may come; and no interpretation of prophecy, whether of the millennium, or ought else, which is inconsistent and incompatible with this, should commend itself to our acceptance, or be regarded as Scriptural for a single moment.

I must also add that this argument, as far as it goes, bears with equal force also, against the historical, as contrasted with the literal and futurist principle of interpretation of prophecy. The literal principle interposes nothing but what Scripture literally interposes between the Ascension and the Advent; and Scripture literally interposes nothing but the preaching the Gospel for a witness unto all nations—the restoration of Israel in part—the revelation of the man of sin—and the battle of Armageddon: these are the only events Scripture interposes, and these, literally understood, would not of necessity, and (with the exception of the first) will not, we believe, in fact, require more than a few years—some seven years or so—for their entire accomplishment. Perfectly does this principle harmonize with the admonitions in question.

THE TITLES OF OUR LORD.

OH! what is Jehovah, Messiah, to me?
My Lord and my God, my Immanuel he.
My Prophet, my Priest, and my Sacrifice, too,
My Advocate, Holy One, Faithful and True;
And he is my Life, and my Truth, and my Way.
My Leader and Teacher, for him I obey;
My Ransom, Redeemer, for him I Kinsman, my Friend,
All sweetly in Jesus the Nazarene blend.
And he is my Peace, and my Altar beside,
Physician, and Shepherd, and Keeper, and Guide,
My Wonderful, Counsellor, Wisdom and Light.
My Shadow by day and my Beacon by night,
My Horn of Salvation, my Captain in war,
My Dayspring, my Sun, and my bright Morning Star,
My Raiment, Crown, Diadem, Treasure untold;
My Pearl and my Glory in him I behold.
My Saviour is he and my Mediator,
My Bread and my Water, my Dwelling, my Door,
My Branch, and my Vine, and my Lily, my Rose,
My Rock, and my Refuge, whatever oppose;
My sure Resurrection, my Righteousness proved,
My King in his beauty, my Bridegroom, Beloved—
My All is this Son of the Blessed to me;
Now tell me, my brother, what is he to thee?

GOD'S CALL.

GOD calling and shall I not hear?
Earth's pleasures shall I still hold dear?
Shall life's swift passing years all fly,
And still my soul in slumbers lie?
God calling yet! shall I not rise?
Can I his loving voice despise,
And basely his kind care repay?
He calls me still; can I delay?
God calling yet! and shall he knock
And I my heart the closer lock?
He still is waiting to receive,
And shall I dare his spirit grieve?
God calling yet; and shall I give
No heed, but still in bondage live?
I wait, but he does not forsake,
He calls me still! My heart, awake!
God calling yet! loud at my door is knocking,
And I my heart, my ear still firmer locking.
He still is ready, willing to receive me,
Is waiting now, but oh! he soon may leave me.
God calling yet, and I no answer giving;
I dread his yoke and am in bondage living;
Too long I linger, but not yet forsaken,
He calls me still, oh, my poor heart, awaken.
God calling yet! I cannot stay;
My heart I yield without delay.
Vain world, farewell! from thee I part;
The voice of God hath reached my heart.

Christian Cheerfulness.

By Pastor Thomas Spurgeon

IT is the bounden duty of every child of God to be happy. He who has said: "Be ye holy, for I am holy," has, in effect, said: "Be ye happy," for he himself is so. Ours is a glad and gladdening God. He is the blessed, i. e., the happy God, and he is never so happy as when he sees his children "taking after" their rejoicing Father. Jesus, man of sorrows though he was, "rejoiced in spirit." As springs of fresh water rise even in the sea, so cheerfulness manifested itself even amid the brine of his sad life. The Emperor of woe, whose sorrows were unsurpassed, nevertheless "exulted" in spirit, and we would fain be as he was in the world.

The Holy Ghost is glad. 'Twas in the Holy Spirit that the Son of God "exulted." Is he not the author of joy, the source of all true cheerfulness? "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace."

Moreover, the injunction is so plain. The Old Testament commands it. The New Testament commends it. The prophets predict it, and the Apostles prescribe it. Jesus, and James, and Peter, and John all enjoin it. Paul repeats and emphasizes the obligation, saying: "Rejoice in the Lord always, and again, I say, rejoice."

One of the greatest hindrances to the speedy spread of the truth is the joylessness of its professors. My old schoolmaster used to say: "Boys, I never advertise. You are my advertisements!" Perhaps that was why he made us wear caps with gold bands about them. We are God's advertisements, so let us bear the glittering circlet of a joyful spirit. No one will want to enter the college of Jesus if his pupils look sour and sorrowful. Alas! how many do, although his yoke is easy and his burden light. The Lord would have his people be as sky-larks, not as scare-crows. Enough religion to make one miserable is not enough for me. God forbid that any of my readers should look as if their Christianity disagreed with them. Sour visaged saints provide a sorry recommendation of the sweet Lord Jesus. I once in a Queensland town enquired the way to the sugar refinery, the manager of which I wished to see. "Oh," said one. "It has been turned into a vinegar factory." So I gave up my quest. Turn your vinegar distilleries into sugar refineries if you will, but not vice-versa, for there is bitterness and crabbedness enough, God knows, on every hand. "Let the children of Zion be joyful in their King. Jehovah cursed Israel because, said he: 'Thou servedst not the Lord thy God with joyfulness and with gladness of heart.'"

I came across a canary once which could not be made to sing at all. Even sugar did not make it say "sweet," nor did music set it singing. Not a sound was heard, not a single note. Closer examination revealed the fact that it was "as dead as a herring." Its sorrowing friends had stuffed it, propped it up on its accustomed perch, and provided food and water to aid the delusion. What a fraud! For my part I would not tolerate such an imposition in my parlor. I had almost rather have a cage of unclean birds than such mockery. Wire cages are meant for living birds, glass cases are most suitable for dead ones. I wonder if these words will be read by any who are fairly represented by this mocking bird. Do you sit in the pew, or perhaps on a high official perch in the sanctuary, and yet never really praise God? Are you surrounded by gospel viands—"Bread of Life," and "Living Water," which remain untasted? I pray you be not a Christian of the stuffed canary sort. Be what you profess to be—happy Christians, "Singing all the time."

Then serve with mirth, his praise forth tell
Come ye before him and rejoice.

Those who are right hearted should be bright hearted. Of croakers there are enough and to spare. Let us not swell the number. "But," saith one, "we have sorrows surging round us, storms threatening and temptations trying us. I have not forgotten this. How could I? for I myself am a man, and 'man is born to trouble, as the sparks fly upward.' Joy would scarcely be praiseworthy if it thrived only under sunlit-skies. Christian cheerfulness, unlike the ordinary sort, flourishes despite opposing and repressing circumstances. Like the stormy petrel it loves the gale. It paints rainbows on the blackest clouds, and finds brightest jewels in darkest mines. It hails the night that it may twinkle star-like, it welcomes the fire that it may grow greener when the flame has passed. It resembles love in that it survives its trials. Many waters cannot quench it, neither can the floods drown it. As, according to the legend, the golden organ which the monks threw into the rushing river when their monastery was being sacked, poured forth its melody for many a day beneath the stream; so Christian joy refuses to be silenced even by floods of sorrow. It may be more subdued, but it is not less melodious. I well remember a Christian lad, who having to do a somewhat menial task in the dark cellar, started, singing, 'Go bury thy sorrow,' as he set to work. The singing and the song were both appropriate. A cheerful disposition helps the weary worker greatly. A snatch of song is as an extra pulley or second lever when the weight proves heavy. How the sailors sing as they heave and tug. I have seen a ponderous main-yard that had been lowered for repairs, rise slowly but surely to its place again without the aid of machinery, as 'all hands' strained at the tackle singing merrily meanwhile.

Our griefs are only as the wind without which the melodious Aeolian harp would remain silent, or as the bow whose friction charms the music from the old viol. Some of David's sweetest psalms were evoked by trial. The songs which from the desert rise are amongst the most acceptable to God. If we can but believe that our Father has permitted our tribulations we shall be able to sing in the storm and to praise him in the furnace. Hezekiah's was a mournful dirge until he cried, "He hath both spoken unto me, and himself hath done it." Then only did he get out of the minor key. He who had chattered like a crane or a swallow was soon singing like a nightingale. Hear him: "Thou hast in love to my soul delivered it from the pit of corruption; for thou hast cast all my sins behind thy back." Ah! yes, there, just there, is our reason for ceaseless song. Pardoned sin is cause for eternal praise.

The removal of sin, the source of sorrow, is a source of perennial joy; for pardon brings peace, and peace involves power, and power over sin produces purity, and purity is the promise of paradise. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." Wherefore let us shout aloud to the glory of our covenant-keeping Jehovah. "It is good to sing praises to our God." If Paul and Silas could pray at midnight and sing praises unto God, though they were bound in the inner prison, surely we who walk at liberty should bless the Lord at all times! His praise should continually be in our mouth. Or if we, too, have our feet fast in the stocks we may praise him still. "The prisoners were listening," so says the record in the book of Acts. Perchance they were set a singing, too! Who can tell whose hearts we may inspire if we can only say with Madame Guyon

A little bird I am, shut out from fields of air,
And in my cage I sit and sing to him who placed me there,
Well pleased a prisoner to be, because, my God, it pleaseth thee."

Come, dear reader, it is time to get out of the "doldrums" and the "dumps." Cultivate what little gladness still remains to you. It will make surprising progress in an atmosphere of prayer and hope. Jesus can extract music even from a bruised reed. Your case seems desperate, but you are still living. "Never say die." Moreover, "the Lord liveth." "He faileth not." I do not ask you to maintain the perpetual grin which some affect, but I do urge you to "rejoice evermore" with a joy that results from calm confidence in God. You can encourage yourself as David did in God when all else is gone. Ziklag smoking, wives kidnapped, goods stolen, and the people insubordinate, "but David encouraged himself in the Lord his God." Joy rises high that comes from such a source. It is because the tanks are elevated several hundreds of feet that the fountains at the London Crystal Palace leap to such a height. Climb the water-towers and you will cease to wonder at the altitude of the geyser-like jets of water. Thus it is in the realm of grace. The nether springs are fed by the upper. Joy in the Lord is not evanescent and paltry. He who truly trusts can really rejoice. Oh, for more gladness of the estatic and exultant sort! Oh, for Icelandic geysers of delight instead of joy of the penny squirt order! Oh, for God's gladness and the Spirit's sacred mirth. Oh for that joy of which Jesus said, "I have spoken to you that my joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full." Do not be afraid, dear reader, of being cheerful. "The joy of the Lord is your strength." Do you feel the streams of gladness stirring within? Seek not to keep them pent. "Spring up. O well, sing ye unto it."

Snow-ploughs and their Uses.

Snow-ploughs are now an indispensable adjunct of transcontinental winter travel, and every railroad that traverses our northwestern states has more or less occasion for their use. Our photograph on this page shows a plough on the Northern Pacific Railroad. It is interesting to see one of these ponderous-looking machines, turning with tremendous swiftness and power, as it bores its way into some huge drift, making the snow rise about it like a cloud and fall in long lines on either side of the track. Sometimes, when the snow is unusually heavy and packed, it is necessary to use several engines behind the plough, but however deep the drifts may be, they never fail to give way ultimately to the battering of the powerful machine. On the Canadian roads very heavy snow ploughs are used to keep the lines open. In some northern cities electric snow-ploughs have lately come into use upon the trolley lines.

The Sultan's Home Life.

Splendid Luxury of the Yildiz Palace
—The Harem and its Rules.

WHILE his own country is in a condition bordering on revolution, the result of a long period of misgovernment and of frightful barbarities among certain classes of his subjects, the Sultan of Turkey continues to live a life of semi-seclusion and indifference at the Yildiz Palace. The Echo, a Berlin newspaper, publishes a most interesting account of a visit to the Yildiz Palace. The part most interesting to foreigners is probably that which is reserved for the women—the Harem. It is divided into several courts (Dairas) each of which is ruled by a prominent member of that terrible female hierarchy which numbers no less than 1,500! The women of the Imperial Harem are divided into three classes: Rhadines or legitimate wives, Ikbals or favorites, out of whose ranks the Rhadines are chosen, and Ghienzades who have a chance to advance to the rank of Ikbals. By law all the women of the Sultan must enter the Harem as slaves, and the ruler of Turkey is therefore invariably the son of a slave. The majority have been stolen or purchased very young in Circassia and Georgia. As soon as one of these women bears a child to the Sultan she becomes free and advances to the rank of a princess. Every orthodox Mussulman has four Rhadine, or Iyrbimah, and so of course the Sultan has them. The first is called the Bai Rhadine, the second Skindgi Rhadine, the third Artame Rhadine, and the fourth Rutshuk Rhadine. Though they have precedence according to their number, their households are exactly alike. They stand, however, under a common mistress, the Valide Sultan or mother of the Sultan, to whom as much deference is shown as to the Sultan himself. If she dies, her place is taken by the Sultan's nurse, and then by the Hassau Uda or housekeeper of the Sultan.

There are several nominal Christians among the women of the Sultan, and strange to say, they are not asked to renounce their faith. Jewesses, however, cannot become members of the Harem. Each daughter or sister of the Sultan adopts the title as a distinguishing family name, being called Leila Sultan, Fatma Sultan, &c. The women of the Harem wear European dresses, made in Paris or Vienna. On when they appear before the Valide, they dress in orthodox Turkish style. As long as they are properly veiled, they may visit, go to the bazaar, and walk as they please. In the palace itself, there are extensive and beautiful gardens for their occasional amusement.

The Sultan himself arises at 6 A. M. and works with his secretaries until 1 o'clock, when he breaks his fast. Then he takes a ride or a sail, and afterward he gives audience. He dines at 8 P. M. generally alone, though occasionally an ambassador is invited. In the evening he plays with his children. Curiously enough he may not speak any other language than his visitors talk Turkish or Arabic, although he talks the best of French, a quietude compels him to make use of an interpreter.

His Good Work to Go On.

When, in 1867, George Peabody left $3,000,000 for an educational fund, he empowered the trustees to distribute the principal at the end of thirty years, if they desired. Since that time $2,400,000 of income has been spent on education, and $2,000,000 in capital remains. All but two of the original members of the board of trustees are dead. But the present board has just decided that this is not an opportune time for the distribution of the principal, and the income will be used as heretofore. The money has been distributed in the South, and was a great relief to educational institutions suffering from the impoverishment of the war. Thus the good work inaugurated through the liberality of Mr. Peabody will go on without interruption and thousands will be the beneficiaries.

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE.

"Curling" on the Ice.

Bracing Winter Sport that is Becoming Popular with Americans.

AMONG the winter sports that have been imported from other lands, there is probably none that holds greater promise of enjoyment for the participants than the game of curling, which is illustrated in the photograph on this page.

Where the game originated is not known, but it has been popular in North Britain for three centuries at least. Some writers trace it to a Teutonic origin, the word "curl" being derived from the German kur wail, meaning a game, and "tee" from the Teutonic word tighen, to point out, while "bonspiel" (a curling phrase) is traced to bonne spel, a Belgic local term, and "rink" is similarly distinguishable in the Saxon word krink, meaning "a strong man." It is thought possible that Flemish merchants may have introduced it to Britain about the sixteenth century. The game has long been a favorite one among our Canadian friends, who play with great skill, and of late years it has grown in favor here and is now played on many American ponds and rivers every winter. It calls for eight players, four on a side, and may be briefly described as follows: It calls for a rink about forty-two yards long and eight feet wide, with a "tee" at either end. It is played with round, flat stones, weighing from thirty to forty-five pounds, and about nine inches in diameter. Strong wooden handles are fastened to the stones to enable the players to hurl them with sufficient force. A smooth sheet of ice is chosen for the rink. At each end of the rink a number of concentric rings, called "broughs," are drawn, the centre of which is the "tee." Each player has a pair of curling stones, and a director of the game, called a "skip," is chosen. The players on each side play alternately. The object is to hurl the stone along the ice to the "tee." The interest of the game depends very largely on one side being able to drive their rivals' stones from their positions, and getting their own in favorable positions. At a little distance from each of the "tees" is a line drawn across the ice, called the "hog-score," and any stone not driven past it counts for nothing and is put aside. The side first scoring thirty-one points wins the game. When, during the progress of the game one, two, or more stones have been well planted, the supporters of those who placed them are usually directed by their skip rather to guard the winning stones than venture too near them at the risk of injuring their position. On the other hand the tactics of the opposing party will consist in efforts to knock off the guards, dislodge the well-planted stones, or get their own still better placed where that is possible. It sometimes happens that the stone nearest the "tee"—the winner, as it is called—is so well protected that it cannot be touched and defies removal unless it be assailed by an ingenious master-stroke, technically termed "wicking" or "inringing," whereby a stone is sent in an oblique direction so as to hit the winner; and, if it not only does that, but becomes the winner in its stead, the man who throws it is sure to be hailed by his exulting comrades as a prince among curlers.

As an out-door winter game, curling has few equals, although to play it with satisfaction, one needs to be warmly clad, with plenty of wraps, thick shoes with spikes, and heavy gloves. A cold player with numbed fingers cannot make a score at the curling rink.

One very pleasant thing about curling in Britain, is that all classes take part in the game—peers, peasants, farmers, country people and tradesmen.

Cultivate Your Children's Voices.

What a delightful experience it is, to visit a family whose youthful members are naturally musical and whose parents, with rare appreciation, have striven to cultivate the musical talent of their children. Fresh young voices make the sweetest music the world ever knows. Whether at home, in concert hall or in church choir, a good voice is a "thing of joy." But the heart, too, should be right with God, if we are to attain the highest point of musical expression. Singing should be the direct personal offering of each worshipper to his Maker. Therefore, make a joyful noise unto God, and praise the Lord in the assembly of his people. Treasure your hymn book, for it represents the consecrated talent of all ages, and lands, and sections of the church. Use it in your private devotions. If you find it difficult to sing the hymns, read them, that these song birds of the church may find an abiding home in your memory, and fill your whole being with their melody.

Day-Dreamers in the Home.

The habit of day-dreaming is apt to produce a condition of discontent. Day-dreamers, says a thoughtful writer, do not always have pleasant dreams. Often they pause in their work to magnify a little discomfort or trouble, until they have imagined themselves beggars or martyrs, unloved or unappreciated, as their different dispositions dictate. The house-wife who has fallen into this habit of day-dreaming cannot make the home-life successful; cannot contribute much to the happiness of others; cannot be happy herself. She is forever drawing comparisons between the actual and the ideal, which makes her dissatisfied, and dissatisfaction is contagious.

Well-Conditioned Children.

A well-conditioned child, writes Ian Maclaren, illustrates better than anything else on earth the distinctive features of Christian character. Because he does not assert or aggrandize himself. Because he has no memory for injuries, and no room in his heart for a grudge. Because he has no previous opinions, and is not ashamed to confess his ignorance. Because he can imagine, and has the key of another world, entering in through the ivory gate and living amid the things unseen and eternal.

Juvenile Sorrows.

Most persons of adult years can recall out of the memories of their earlier life some experiences of disappointment, or of grief, or of a sense of some little injustice, which made life seem to them for the time

A COMMON CARRIER.

REST thee, sweet child-mine, rest,
Thou little pilgrim dear;
Thy bed is mother's breast—
Just now, thou need'st not fear.
Rest thee; thy waking eyes
Full soon will surely see Sad sights enough, thou prize,
New from eternity.

Rest thee; thou must be spent
With thy long journey here
From holier realms, God-sent,
Into our nether sphere.

Rest thee; thou bring'st to me
New life and hope, repose
And faith, and fancies free,
To guard thee 'gainst all foes.

CHILDREN AND PLAYTHINGS.

FEW mothers realize their responsibility in training into right channels the tireless energy of the restless youngsters in the home. It may seem an unnecessary bother at the time to stop to interest the child in these small things—it is so much easier to tell the inquiring little one to "run off and play, mamma's busy now," than to pause in the household cares and take the time to sympathize with the child over the broken toy, and suggest methods of restoring it to some new use and beauty. A toy that has outlived its usefulness in one direction, as originally intended, says a writer in The Home Queen, may serve an altogether different purpose when resurrected from some direful accident, and it will seem even more valuable than when first received, when the little owner realizes that it is to his efforts that it owes its present value. And in connection with the present pastime and pleasure afforded the child, by this interest in discovering new possibilities in seemingly valueless things, a habit will be formed that will be of the greatest use to him throughout his life.

I think we may or will keep all the old toys and pieces of toys in the future—that is, if we can make room for them. I used to make an annual or semi-annual clear-up. At last, I noticed that an old broken baby's chair had served three boys, one after another, to push about, and use in numberless ways for their enjoyment and occupation. Then old toys began to have a certain charm in my eyes.

Dolls' heads, with a hole in the top, and lacking one eye, are often as acceptable when dressed over, as the most perfect doll just out of the shop. A child has something more than a fancy for bright new things. She has sympathies, and a battered doll, as "poor Susie" calls out the little mother's tenderest emotions.

We are all of us toy-lovers, after all. Nearly all that we do is insignificant from one point of view, though, perhaps, very grand from another. Many of us have to be content with "make-shifts," when we would greatly prefer the new and beautiful. But these very make-shifts come to mean more to us in the end than all the beautiful things which may surround us without any special thought on our own part.

On the whole, it is wise to be content with simplicity. The simplest is most beautiful in many ways. There are more golden rules than one, and one of the best is that we do what our hands find to do with all our "hearts"—as well as with all our might. And the very best plan in our daily lives is to keep up with the spirit of childhood, to make fun out of our work—to be childlike always.

There are by far too many long faces in the world—too much rigid "clearing-up" of broken hopes and aspirations, that still might offer much that is good and noble, if we would only turn them over, view them from all sides, and study their possibilities, until the "bright side" is found. A little more of the free and sunny spirit of childhood would not be amiss in many lives that are now gloomy and dull without real cause.

being no longer worth living, and the thought of an end to their trial in death not wholly terrible. Very childish all this was, of course; but that is the point of its lesson to parents: childish griefs are very real and very trying—to children.

The Children's Heaven.

THE infant lies in blessed ease
Upon his mother's breast;
No storm, no dark, the baby sees Invade his heaven of rest.
He nothing knows of change or death;
Her face his holy skies;
The air he breathes his mother's breath;
His stars, his mother's eyes.

The Father's arms fold like a nest
His children round about;
His face looks down, a heaven of rest,
Where comes no dark, no doubt.
Its mists are clouds of stars that move
In sweet concurrent strife;
Its winds the goings of his love;
Its dew the dew of life.

We for our children seek thy heart,
For them the Father's eyes;
Lord, when their hopes in us depart,
Let hopes in thee arise.
When childhood's visions them forsake,
To women grown and men,
Thou to thy heart their hearts will take,
And bid them dream again.

—GEORGE MACDONALD

THE BOOK SHELF

THE BIRTH OF THE SUN.*

WHEN the world was young and darkness ruled everything, a strange thing happened, said the Talking Pine, as I came and sat in my accustomed place to listen to the tales.

And what is this strange thing, Wise One? I asked.

It was this, saith Talking Pine, this the birth of the sun.

I had heard the tale, Wise One, I answered: and then he told me of this happening:

A long long time ago the world was in darkness and the people didn't have the sun and the moon in the sky to give them light. At this time there was an aged woman, who had a son, who was bright and was much loved by his mother. This boy went to see his grandmother at one time and stayed with her many days. When he started home again through the forest he was stolen by the chief of the demons and carried away under the mountains, where if any one tried to follow, the mountains would close together and crush whatever was between them.

While he was in the country of the demons, the boy learned much magic and became a great man, and then by his magic powers found the way out of the country and back to his own tribe again.

Now, when this boy was stolen, his mother was very sad and mourned for many days, because she thought she would not have her son again to comfort her in her loneliness: the Protector gave her another son.

The second son also grew to be a bright boy, and was loved by all who knew him, and loved most by his mother.

Now time went on and after many snows had passed the first son came back, and found his brother occupying his place at home. Instead of welcoming him, the wanderer became angry at him and said he would change him into the moon, and he should be chief of the night, while he would use his magic and change himself into the sun and rule the day. This he did, and the first day began. As the elder brother, who was the sun, climbed up to the sky, it began to get very hot, for he was very angry, and shone fierce and bright.

Soon the rivers dried up, and the people began to die of the heat. When the sun saw these things, he said that he was too strong; so he changed things about, and made his younger and weaker brother the sun, and took his brother's place as the moon, and things went along all right as they do to this day.

Now you can see the man in the moon on any bright night and, if you could see hard enough, you could see the boy in the sun, but the sun is bright to look at and the boy not easy to find. This then, is how the days and nights started. So said the Talking Pine, there by the lake of the mountains a long time ago, and he is wise and knows how all these things came about.

West and the Young Artist*

WHEN Samuel F. B. Morse, afterwards famous as the inventor of the electric telegraph, was a young painter studying in London, he made a drawing from a small cast of the Farnese Hercules, intending to offer it to Benjamin West as an example of his work.

Being very anxious for the favorable opinion of the master, he spent a fortnight upon the drawing, and thought he had made it perfect.

When Mr. West saw the drawing he examined it critically, commended it in this and that particular, then handed it back, saying, "Very well, sir, very well; go on and finish it."

"But it is finished," said the young artist. "Oh, no!" said Mr. West; "look here, and here, and here," and he put his finger on various unfinished places.

Mr. Morse saw the defects, now that they were pointed out to him, and devoted another week to remedying them. Then he carried the drawing again to the master.

Mr. West was evidently much pleased, and lavished praises upon the work; but at the end he handed it back, and said, as before, "Very well, indeed, sir; go on and finish it."

"Is it not finished?" asked Mr. Morse, by this time all but discouraged.

"Not yet; you have not marked that muscle, nor the articulations of the finger-joints."

The student once more took the drawing home, and spent several days in retouching it. He would have it done this time.

But the critic was not yet satisfied. The work was good, "very good, indeed; remarkably clever;" but it needed to be "finished."

"I cannot finish it," said Mr. Morse, in despair.

"Well," answered Mr. West, "I have tried you long enough. You have learned more by this drawing than you would have accomplished in double the time by a dozen half-finished drawings. It is not numerous drawings, but the character of one that makes a thorough draughtsman. Finish one picture, sir, and you are a painter."

Israel's Teachers.*

ESPECIAL care in sifting the sources is demanded in the case of Hebrew history, for the reason that its events are so far removed from the present.

Of its many sources, by far the richest is the Old Testament. This is in reality a great library, containing the remnants of a nation's literature. It consists of books and parts of books, coming from different epochs and authors, who write from different points of view and with different aims. The modern Occidental student often finds it confusing and almost unintelligible, because the material is not arranged systematically. Classification is therefore the first requisite. A quotation from the mouth of the enemies of the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. 18:18) suggests a system both fundamental and practical: "For the law shall not perish from the priest, nor counsel from the wise, nor the word from the prophet." It introduces the three great classes of workers who guided and moulded Hebrew life, and refers to their characteristic literary products.

Superior to their contemporaries in consecration, intelligence and earnestness, and enlightened by Jehovah, the Hebrew prophets saw facts and truths unknown to their contemporaries. They were by virtue of the possession of this deeper knowledge equipped and commissioned to proclaim to their countrymen, as his ambassadors, the message of the Highest. A divinely inspired ideal of righteousness and perfection filled their souls. Their eager endeavor to realize that ideal in their nation—so unwise in its policy and so corrupt in its character—made them statesmen, social reformers, and religious and ethical teachers. By stirring address, by public tablet, and by symbolic action, they sought to impress the great truths which had been revealed to them upon their less enlightened contemporaries. In time also they were led to commit their "word" to writing. Thus it was in divine providence that the oral prophesies became part of the Old Testament.

As has been well said, the Hebrew prophets were not foretellers but forth-tellers. Sometimes their message took the form of a prediction respecting the future; more frequently it consisted of burning addresses on the living political, social, and religious questions of their day. This lucid and efficient method of teaching was very popular with both people and prophet.

While the prophets were putting their messages in permanent literary form, the second group of Israel's teachers—the priests—was not inactive. Their chief functions during their great literary period were to care for the national sanctuaries and perform the ceremonial rites; they were the appointed guardians of the ritual. Probably for centuries the sacred laws and customs were transmitted by word of mouth, or only partially committed to writing; but at last there came a time when convenience or existing conditions demanded that they be codified. The origin and history of these laws also became a matter of interest and importance. Therefore the priests were led, like the prophets, to become historians. This fact explains the presence of the parallel histories, which are found interwoven in the Pentateuchal books side by side with those that bear the prophetic stamp.

The third class of Hebrew teachers—the wise men—labored so obtrusively that their work has been almost unnoticed. They spoke in private to the individual, and not in public to the nation. They were the personified common-sense of their age and race. Ripe in personal experience, keen observers of human nature, enriched by inherited wisdom, they became the advisers of all classes in ancient Israel. Everything that concerned the ordinary man commanded their attention. They were equally ready with practical advice concerning anything, from the purchase of a farm to man's duty to his God. For centuries they taught the masses beside the city gates before they put their "counsel" into written form. The book of Proverbs is their most characteristic product; it contains the crystallized experience of the enlightened sages. When they came to grapple with the great problems of life, the Song of Songs, Job, and Ecclesiastes were added to their literature.

Two other books, poetical in form, deeply religious in essence, remain,—Psalms and Lamentations. They represent the outpouring of the souls of devout Hebrews of all ages as they came into the presence of Jehovah. They may be designated as the devotional literature of the Old Testament. Praise to the Lord, the source of all blessing, or an earnest cry for deliverance from evil and danger, is the prevailing chord. Prophet, priest and sage unite with king and peasant in the authorship of this song-book of worshipful humanity.

The material in this old library, which is the great source for Hebrew history, may be classified as follows: Prophetic Literature,—the prophetic portions of the Hexateuch, and Judges, Ruth, Samuel, Kings, Jonah, and the prophecies of the Major and Minor Prophets. Legal Literature,—the priestly portions of the Hexateuch and Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther. Wisdom Literature,—Proverbs, Song of Songs, Job, and Ecclesiastes. Devotional Literature,—Psalms and Lamentations.

Requests for Prayer.

At the Converts' Sunday Afternoon Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission, prayer was offered on Dec. 27, in accordance with the requests of many persons, among whom the following ask the prayers of our readers:

In the Conversion of Relatives and Friends.

fallen under the power of strong drink, and that he may have strength to resist temptation.—R. T. G., Baltimore, Md., for the conversion of a soldier who "fears not God, neither regards man," and that special grace may be given him in his new station in the far West to enable him to resist temptation.—L. S., Amboy, Minn., for the conversion of her mother, and husband.—B. E., Webb City, Mo., that a beloved brother who is in sore trouble, may give his heart to Christ and look to him for help and guidance.—"Anxious," Montandale, Pa., that two brothers and a very dear friend may all turn to the Lord and be saved.—"Believer," Sacramento, Cal., for the conversion of a man who is utterly indifferent to religion and to his own eternal interests.—L. A. T., Fairfax, Va., that a dear boy may give his heart to Christ in his youth.—"Reader," Silver Creek, N. Y., for the conversion of a bright, talented man who has fallen under the power of strong drink, and that grace may be given him to enable him to overcome a violent temper.—"Anxious Mother," Austin, Tex., that her son who is her sole support, and who is becoming addicted to intoxicating liquor, may be delivered and made a new creature in Christ.—M. C. R., Etters, N. Y., that an erring husband who is far from God may be brought into the fold and cleansed from all his sins.—Mother, Bridgewater, for the salvation of a son who is a slave to liquor and tobacco, that he may be saved before his mother's heart is quite broken.—"Trifled Mother," Averett, Va., for the conversion of two sons who are in the bonds of drinking habit, and that they may have strength from God to resist the evil.—J. H., son of City, Ia., that an orphan girl who is being led astray by strong temptation, may be rescued from evil and made a child of God.—"Believer," Springfield, Ill., for the conversion of a dissipated father, and that courage may be given to a son who shrinks from confessing Christ.—Anxious Mother in Illinois, that God would touch the hearts of a dear son and wife and make them truly his, and lead them to trust in him for the blessings they need.—C. N. R., Fountain, Colo., who has two brothers and two sisters who are all unsaved, begs that Christian friends will join in pleading with God for their conversion.—Relative, Albany, Mo., that a young man whose parents and family made great sacrifices for his education, may have a changed heart and may show by filial conduct that he appreciates their love and kindness.—T. R., Monomowoc, Wis., that a beloved husband of only son may cease to trust in a good natural life for salvation and may look to Christ for a new nature.—E. W. G., St. Cloud, Minn., that a dear son away from home among strangers may give his heart to God and be rescued from sin and become a child of God.—B., Mobile, Ala., for the conversion of five young men who are in earnest need of God's grace.—"Believer," Eureka, Cal., for the conversion of some people who are sceptical and not know Christ as a Saviour.—Friend, Ange, Tex., for a beloved brother who has fallen under the power of intoxicating drink, that he might be delivered and made a child of God.—"Sorrowful," South Bend, Ind., that husband, son, and brother who are indifferent to the welfare of their souls may be awakened to their danger and may seek salvation.—L. B., Adna, Wash., the mother of three sons who are all unsaved, and two of them slaves of the liquor habit, begs prayer for their conversion and that they may receive strength to resist their besetting sin.—M. L., Richboro, Pa., that God would touch with converting power the heart of her son who has been led away by evil companions. He is not only son and she is a widow.—Reader, Maryland, Mo., that her family of five sons and one daughter who are not Christians may give their hearts to God.—F. E. W., Mantoloking, Minn., for the conversion of an aged man once professed Christ, but has returned to the world.—G. I. S., Pikesville, Md., for her mother, brothers and sisters, that they may realize their need of salvation and seek Christ with all their hearts.

that two widows, a mother and daughter, may regain their health and be able to earn an honest livelihood.—W. H. G., Sterling, Iowa, the recovery of a dear son who is very sick.—J. H. H., Washington, N. C., that the God of love and mercy would recover a sick husband who is very low.—M. G.

H., Orrington, Me., for the restoration of hearing.—English woman, Markesau, Wis., for the healing of a most painful and distressing disease.—Constant Reader, Averett, Va., that an illness which prevents her participating in the means of grace, may be removed.—E. L. S., Amboy, Minn., for the restoration of hearing.—Mother, Ogden, Utah, for recovery from nervous prostration.

For Special Blessings.

Widowed mother, Cherry Creek, N. Y., asks prayer that her son may be more dutiful, and refrain from an attempt to impoverish her.—Anxious Father, Brooklyn, N. Y., that his son who has for years been a source of misery, may be enabled to obtain employment, and may cease to give himself to dissipation.—Mother, Averett, Va., that her eldest son may become more thoughtful and considerate.—B. E., Webb City, Mo., that a dear brother may soon find the employment he needs.—D. S. B., Gail, Tex., for deliverance from a heavy affliction and for strength to live a Christian life.—Believer, Mitchell, S. D., that two dear friends who are at enmity, may be reconciled.—A., Lancaster, Pa., that God would be pleased to prosper an earnest effort to earn a livelihood and enable a business man to meet his obligations punctually.—"One who loves Jesus," Richmond, Ark., that God would forgive past sins and speak peace to a heart now torn by remorse.

Persons desiring the prayers of the Converts' Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission should address their letters to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 91-102 Bible House, New York.

Longevity in Early Ages.

ACCUSTOMED as we are to the comparative brevity of the present term of human life, writes Rev. W. A. Crocker, it seems almost incredible that mankind should ever have attained to such ages as are recorded of these ancient patriarchs. Omitting the name of Abel, whose life was prematurely ended by the violence of his brother Cain, we have the recorded ages of nine patriarchs, extending from Adam to the flood; and their average age was 816 years. Wonderful as this now appears to us, it should not be deemed incredible. Dr. A. Atkinson, of Baltimore, Md., has published in the "Virginia Medical Monthly," Richmond, Va., the names and residences of 232 persons who have died within the past century at the age of 100 years and over. Of these 50 lived to be over 110, six over 120, four over 130, and one over 140. Besides, we have the name of Henry Jenkins, of London, who lived to the age of 170, and that of Cugna de Numas, of Bengal, who died in 1556, at the age of 370. After the flood the term began to be perceptibly abridged; yet for several centuries a very great age was reached. Thus Shem lived 500 years, Arphaxad 438, Selah 433, Eber 460, Peleg 239, Reu 237, Serug 230, Nahor 148, Terah 205, Abraham 175, Isaac 180, and Jacob 147. We would perhaps be doing injustice to the record to infer that the average age of the nine patriarchs cited was the general average of life in the antediluvian period. These may have been, in some sort, exceptional cases. We have an account only of the line of Seth, among whom the true religion was most strictly observed, and who, presumably, remained at or near the original settlement of the race. Among the vagabond or wandering descendants of Cain, and the more wicked population greater licentiousness prevailed, and more artificial or irregular conditions existed, which may have exercised a deleterious influence upon them. Nor is it necessary to suppose that this long term of life was Reduced Rates to Washington on Account of the Inauguration via Pennsylvania Railroad.

For the benefit of those who desire to attend the ceremonies incident to the inauguration of President-elect McKinley, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company will sell excursion tickets to Washington March 1, 2, 3, and 4, valid to return from March 4 to 8, at the following rates: From New York, $3.00; Philadelphia, $5.40; Baltimore, $1.60; Harrisburg, $3.20; Williamsport, $3.70; Buffalo, $11.20; Rochester, $10.40; Altoona and Pittsburg, $10.00; and from all other stations on the Pennsylvania system at reduced rates.

This inauguration will be a most interesting event, and will undoubtedly attract a large number of people from every section of the country.

The magnificent facilities of the Pennsylvania Railroad make this line the favorite route to the national capital at all times, and its enormous equipment and splendid terminal advantages at Washington make it especially popular on such occasions.

the result of any supernatural interposition. It might have been, and doubtless was the result of purely natural causes.

The Master and the Harp.

There is an old legion which tells of a strange instrument that hung on a castle wall for many years. No one knew its use. Its strings were broken and covered with dust. Those who saw it wondered what it was and how it had been used. Then one day a stranger came to the castle gate and entered the hall. His eyes saw the dark object on the wall, and taking it down, he reverently brushed the dust from its sides, and tenderly reset its broken strings. Then chords long silent woke beneath his touch, and all hearts were strangely thrilled as he played. It was the master, long absent, who had returned to his own.

In every human soul there hangs a marvelous harp, dust-covered, with strings broken, while yet the master's hand has not found it.

An Indian on Temperance.

Chief Po-ka-gon of the Pottawatto-mies warns his Tribe against Drink.

SIMON PO-KA-GON of Hartford, Michigan, is chief of the Pottawattomie Band of Indians of his State. In a recent address to the white people, he employed this very remarkable language in denunciation of the evil of drunkenness:

"While I appreciate and laud those noble Christian missionaries, I cannot do otherwise than openly condemn those white traders who, dog-like, tagged them into the wilderness and beside the Christian altars they had built, stuck out their signs, and dealt out to our young men and old men that liquid hell which lures but to destroy. Could you see what I have seen and feel what I have felt, as this snake, born of the white man, has coiled itself closer and tighter like a vice around the heart strings of your own family, you would cry out: 'Po-ka-gon, we do not blame, but pity you!' And well you may, for the blood of my people, as the blood of Abel, is crying from the ground against the Cains of humanity who, for paltry gold in times past and even now, are dealing out to our race that cursed abomination of misery and death. You send missionaries across the great deep to save Hindoo children from being drowned in the Ganges, or crushed under the wheels of Juggernaut, and yet in your own Christian land thousands are yearly being drowned in the American Ganges of fire water, while the great Juggernaut of King Alcohol is ever rolling on night and day, crushing its victims without mercy. Hark! Do you hear that agonizing wail on every side? Fathers and sons are falling into drunkards' graves; mothers and daughters are weeping over them; wives are lamenting as they bend over the bruised heads of their husbands as they return from the midnight brawl; and briars of bitter disappointment encumber the bridal garden: brave men and women who have fought long and well to redeem and save the fallen are beginning to fear the power of the saloon and its votaries, while the pious who in faith have prayed long and well are beginning to doubt the favor of God. 'Soon I will stand in the presence of the Great Spirit, and shall there plead with him in heaven as I have plead with him on earth that he will take those by the hand who have so bravely fought against the old dragon, Drink, the destroyer of your children and ours, and lead them on to glorious victory.'"

Food and Morals.

TO a very large proportion of the human race, the relation food sustains to morality and to man's spiritual condition, is probably a subject far removed from serious consideration. Yet the relation is really a distinct and substantial one. In a recent discourse upon this subject, by Rev. R. F. Horton, some very interesting facts were stated in this connection, a few of which we quote:

"We very readily accept the liberty with which Christ has made us free, and use our liberty to eat and to drink things which were forbidden to the Jew; and we somewhat plume ourselves upon our emancipation. So that this curious result has followed: that we are known to the Jews as the eaters of swine flesh, we are known to the Mussulmans as the drinkers of intoxicating drink, we are known to the Hindoo as the eaters of beef. So far we stand fast enough in our liberty, and use the privileges which are given us by the Christian law. But the question is rather this: Do we observe the great and searching regulation that we are to eat and to drink solely to the glory of God? Or to please ourselves? Or to discharge certain social functions? Or to avoid seeming singular amongst the people whose society we frequent?

"Quantity in food is a very difficult subject to treat of from the religious standpoint, but I never can forget an article I once read—I think it was from the pen of the late Mr. Sala—describing the condition of New Zealand, and where all the economical conditions are more favorable for human life than anywhere else. The article told us that workmen receive such large and regular wages that they lived in their own villas, detached or semi-detached, surrounded by their gardens, and are able to command all the comforts and many of the luxuries of life. Then the article proceeded to say that they suffered from the same mental depression and ennui and heaviness of spirit, called the 'spleen,' which afflicts the idle rich. And the reason was the same: that these well-paid workmen took three heavy, solid meals a day, and, to put it briefly, habitually overate themselves. How does a matter like this strike God? He disapproves of the epicure in Greece, or the Sybarite in Southern Italy, and the man and woman who gorges, entirely forgets that in order to be efficient for God's service, gluttony is a sin?

Everyone, therefore, must make his own diet, and discover for himself what is bad and what is good. There are some things which for me or for you are very obviously constant hindrances to a good life. There are some things which for you and for me excite the lower passions, and set on fire the worst side of our nature. Now for the glory of God these things must not be taken! You have to find what they are. And if you understand that the responsibility lies with you, you will be able to act in accordance with it!"

Words that Pain.

ALL child with your lightsome spirit,
And happy beaming face,
And your glad young life surrounded
With tender love and grace.
There are tears in the eyes of your mother,
I saw them dropping slow—
You can never unsay the words you said
One little hour ago.

Life is so blest for you, darling,
The path stretches wide and fair,
But need you forget the dear home-love
And mother's patient care?
O the careless words, the impatient tone,
Their mission is cruel as a blow,
Yet you can't unsay the words you said
One little hour ago.

TO THE READERS OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

I have discovered a reliable CURE FOR CONSUMPTION and all Bronchial, Throat, Lung, and Heart Diseases, Catarrhal Affections, General Weakness, Loss of Flesh and all conditions of Wasting Away. By its timely use thousands of apparently hopeless cases have been PERMANENTLY CURED. Lung Troubles lead to Consumption, and Consumption uninterrupted, means speedy and certain death.

So proof-positive am I of its POWER TO CURE, based upon actual experience, that to make its merits known to sufferers, I will send direct from my Laboratory, FREE, to any person afflicted, THREE BOTTLES of my Newly Discovered Remedies, upon receipt of request for same accompanied by Express and Postoffice address.

Sincerely yours,

An Asthma Cure at Last.

It gives us great pleasure to announce the discovery of a positive cure for Asthma, in the wonderful Kola Plant, a new African product found on the Congo River, West Africa. The cures wrought by it in the worst cases, are really marvelous. Sufferers of twenty to fifty years' standing have been at once restored to health by the Kola Plant. Among others, many ministers of the gospel testify to its wonderful powers. Rev. J. L. Combs, of Martinsburg, West Va., was perhaps the worst case, and was cured by the Kola Plant after fifty years' suffering. Mr. Albert C. Lewis, Washington, D. C., Editor of the Farmer's Magazine, gives similar testimony, as do many others. To prove to you beyond doubt its wonderful curative power, the Kola Importing Co., No. 116 Broadway, New York, will send a large case of the Kola Compound free by mail to every reader of The Christian Herald who suffers from any form of Asthma. They only ask in return that when cured yourself you will tell your neighbors about it. You should surely try it, as it costs you nothing.

HEROIC PERSONALITIES

BY REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

Elizabeth Stuart Phelps' First Speech.

ELIZABETH STUART PHELPS, or at least that was her name before the "Burglar" had moved "Paradise," who has led many of us along the glorified path between the Gates," and filled us with a noble ambition to lead "A Singular Life," has put the reading world under a new debt of attitude by publishing, through magazine and book, some "Chapters from a Life," and that life her own.

One of the most interesting sketches in tells of a day when she was riding through the streets of Gloucester, where "The Old Maids' Paradise" was established, when, noting an excited throng of angry men and women, she inquired of two women talking together at the street-side, what had happened.

The women looked at her rather scornfully at first, and then made answer: "Hav'n't you heard? Why, it happened—s rum-shop." After a moment's pause the woman continued, "There's a man murdered there. He's just dead. Jim and this other fellow had words, and he drove a knife into him and out again three times. He's stone dead, layin' there on the floor. See the men-folks' crowdin' around to look at him! If men-folks will do such things, they must expect such things to happen. I hope they won't have stick nor stone to that place, come mornin'!"

"Was he a married man?"

"She lives up the block. And the young ones."

"How many?"

"Twelve."

"Has anybody been to see this poor creature—the widow? Has any woman come to her?"

"Hey?" Staring. "I guess not. Not at I know of."

Elizabeth Stuart Phelps drove straight to the house where the poor, grief-stricken woman was wailing in the midst of her children. After doing all that she could to comfort her, she went back home with new conception of the horrors that are caused by the liquor traffic. She says herself of this transformation: "All my traditions went down, and my common sense and human heart came up. From that day I asked no questions, I had no replies," but gave my sympathy, without paltry hesitation, to the work done by the women of America for the salvation of men endangered or ruined by the liquor habit."

After thinking the matter over she came to a conclusion most astonishing to all her friends, that she would go on the next Sunday and hold services in the rum-shop where the man had been murdered. All their protestations fell on deaf ears, for she had made up her mind and nothing could turn her from the new path of duty Providence had seemed to make clear.

She visited the bartender, and he was more than willing to have her use his saloon, for he hoped in that way that something of the shadow of disgrace which hung over his place might be lifted away.

"You'll say, won't you," pleaded the dealer in death, "that this ain't my fault? You'll tell 'em it might have happened anywhere, won't you? Why, it might have happened in a church. There's murders do! You'll say so, won't you, ma'am?"

She did not commit herself as to what the substance of her discourse would be, but secured the services of a lovely, gray-haired Christian woman to assist her. Her heart came near failing her at the last, and she begged her helper to speak in her place. But the old lady gently but firmly refused.

Miss Phelps plead with her, "I never opened my mouth in a public place in my life. I shall drop of stage-fright—and think of the scene!"

When the hour arrived the saloon was packed and the overflowing crowd extended out into the street. A few women came with her to sing, but most of the hearers were the kind of men who ordinarily frequented this saloon and others like it. The great red stain in the floor where the man was murdered was covered from sight by the crowd.

They sang a hymn or two, the new temperance lecturer read a little from the Bible, and then spoke the earnest words that were in her heart, and came away. "Those men listened to us," says Mrs. Ward, "as if they had never heard a message of mercy before in all their lives, and never might again. I remember that some of them hung their heads upon their breasts, like guilty children; and that they looked ashamed and sorry. But most of them met us in the eye, and drank what we said thirstily."

That was her first speech, but not her last. For this good work went on for three years, and many a poor, tempted man came to bless the woman who had such a strange power over him and his fellows. Often she was accosted on the street by strange men who would detain her respectfully to say:

"I hear when you talk to folks they stop drinkin'. I wish you'd talk to me!"

We may be sure such a request was never made in vain.

Remodeling a Gown

becomes a pleasing occupation, provided it was stitched on a Singer Automatic. The elastic seam made by this machine is perfectly safe when locked, but can be taken apart in an instant when unlocked. Thus its use is especially desirable for the clever woman who wishes to make over a garment so that it may conform to the changing styles. Whether in the hands of the amateur or the expert, this simple bit of mechanism is the most convenient and effective of any.

Having all the advantages claimed for other "automatic" sewing machines, the Silent Singer has many points of preference that can easily be demonstrated by comparison. Of faultless construction and finish, it is absolutely the lightest-running, the simplest and most compact. It is more easily threaded, and its parts are better protected from dust. The broad treadle better promotes the health and comfort of the operator, because it is lower and the position of the feet can be changed at will. These points are worthy careful consideration by those of delicate health or unaccustomed to continuous use of a sewing machine.

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION

÷ MODENE ÷

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—In COMPOUNDING, an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. It is perfectly pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It acts mildly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth such as the beard or hair on arms may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE SUPERFICIALLY REMOVES.

Recommended by all who have tested its merits.—Used by people of refinement. Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene, which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter, with your full address written plainly. (If correspondence secretly private, postage stamps received the same as cash.) (ALWAYS SAVE YOUR COUNTRY AND TRUST PATRONS.) Cut this advertisement out.

Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., "What art thou, O great mountain? Before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain." Sermon on the Text: Zech. 4: 7:

ZERUBBABEL! Who owned that difficult name, in which three times the letter "b" occurs, disposing most people to stammer in the pronunciation? Zerubbabel was the splendid man called to rebuild the destroyed Temple at Jerusalem. Stone for the building had been quarried, and the trowel had rung at the laying of the corner-stone, and all went well, when the Cuthæans offered to help in the work. They were a bad lot of people, and Zerubbabel declined their help, and then the trouble began. The Cuthæans prejudiced the Secretary of the Treasury against Zerubbabel, so that the wages of the carpenters and masons could not be paid, and the heavy cedar timbers which had been dragged from Mount Lebanon to the Mediterranean and floated in rafts from Beyrout to Joppa, and were to be drawn by ox team from Joppa to Jerusalem, had halted, and as a result of the work of those jealous Cuthæans for sixteen years the building of the Temple was stopped. But after sixteen years, Zerubbabel, the mighty soul, got a new call from God to go ahead with the Temple building, and the Angel of the Lord in substance said: "They have piled up obstacles in the way of Zerubbabel until they have become as a mountain, height above height, crag above crag; but it shall all be thundered down and made flat and smooth as the floor of a house. 'Who art thou, O great mountain? before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain.'"

Well, the Cuthæans are not all dead yet. They are busy in every neighborhood and every city and every nation of every age, heaping obstacles in the way of the cause of God. They have piled up hindrances above hindrances until they have become a hill, and the hill has become a mountain, and the mountain has become an Alp, and there it stands, right in the way of all movements for the world's salvation. Some people are so discouraged about the height and breadth of this mountain in front of them that they have done nothing for sixteen years and many of those who are at work trying to do something toward removing the mountain toil in such a way that I can see they have not much faith that the mountain of hindrances will ever be removed. They feel they must do their duty, but they feel all the time—I can hear it in their prayers and exhortations—that they are striking their pickaxes and shovels into the side of the Rocky Mountains. If the good Lord will help me while I preach I will give you the names of some of the high mountains which are really in the way, and then show you that those mountains are to be prostrated, torn down, ground up, leveled, put out of sight for ever. "Who art thou, O great mountain? before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain."

First, there is the Mountain of Prejudice, as long as a range of the Pyrenees. Prejudice against the Bible as a dull book, an inconsistent book, a cruel book, an unclean book, and in every way an unfit book. The most of them have never read it. They think the strata of the rocks contradict the account in Genesis. The poor souls do not know that the Mosaic account agrees exactly with the geological account. No violin or flute ever were in better accord. By crowbar and pickaxe and shovel and blasting powder the geologist goes down in the earth and says, "The first thing created in the furnishing of the earth was the plants." Moses says, "Ay! I told you that in the Book of Genesis: 'The earth brought forth grass and herb, yielding seed after his kind, and the tree yielding fruit.'" The geologist goes on digging in the earth, and says, "The next thing in the furnishing of the earth was the making of the creatures of the sea." Moses says, "Ay! I told you that was next in the Book of Genesis: 'God said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creatures that have life; and God created great whales.'" The geologist goes on digging, and says, "The next thing in the furnishing of the earth was the creation of the cattle and the reptiles and the beasts of the field." "Ay!" says Moses, "I told you that was next in the first chapter of Genesis: 'And God said, Let the earth bring forth the living creature after his kind, cattle, and creeping thing, and beast of the earth after his kind.'" The geologist goes on digging in the earth, and says, "The next creature was the human family." "Ay!" says Moses, "I told you that was next in the Book of Genesis: 'So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female, created he them.'" Those prejudiced against the Bible do not know that the explorations in Egypt and Palestine and Syria are confirming the Scriptures,—the same facts written on monuments and on the walls of exhumed cities as written in the Bible. The city of Pithom has been unburied, and its bricks are found to have been made without straw, exactly corresponding with the Bible story of the persecuted Hebrews. On terra cotta cylinder recently brought up from thousands of years of burial, the capture of Babylon by Cyrus is told. On a Babylonian gem recently found are the figures of a tree, a man, a woman, and a serpent, and the hands of the man and woman are stretched up toward the tree as if to pluck the fruit. Thus the Bible story of the Fall is confirmed.

In a museum at Constantinople you see a piece of the wall that once in the ancient Temple of Jerusalem separated the court of the Gentiles and the court of the Israelites, to which Paul refers when he says of Christ, "He is our peace, who hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us." On tablets recently discovered have been found the names of prominent men of the Bible, spelled a little different, according to the demands of ancient language. "Adamu" for Adam, "Abramn" for Abraham, "Abli" for Abel, and so on. Twenty-two feet under ground has been found a seal inscribed with the words "Haggai, son of Shebaniah," thousands of years ago cut, showing that the Prophet Haggai, who wrote a part of the Bible, was not a myth. The Royal Engineers have found, eighty feet below the surface of the ground at Jerusalem, Phœnician pottery and hewn stones with inscriptions, showing that they were furnished by Hiram, King of Tyre, just as the Bible says they were. The great names of Bible history, that many suppose are names of imaginary beings, are found cut into imperishable stones, which have within a few years been rolled up from their entombment of ages, such as Sennacherib and Tiglath-Pileser. On the edge of a bronzed step, and on burned brick has been found the name of Nebuchadnezzar. Henry Rawlinson and Oppert and Hincks, and Palestine exploration societies, and Assyriologists, and Egyptologists, have rolled another Bible up from the depths of the earth, and lo! it corresponds exactly with our Bible, the rock Bible just like the printed Bible, inscriptions on cylinders and brick-work cut thirty-eight hundred years before Christ testifying to the truth of what we read eighteen hundred and ninety-seven years after Christ. The story of the Tower of Babel has been confirmed by the fact that recently at Babel an oblong pile of brick one hundred and ten feet high evidences the remains of a fallen tower. In the Inspired Book of Ezra we read of the great and noble Asnapper, a name that meant nothing especial, until recently, in pried-up Egyptian sculpture, we have the story there told of him as a great hunter as well as a great warrior. What I say now is news to those prejudiced against the Bible. They are so far behind the times that they know not that the Old Book is being proved true by the prying eye of the antiquarian and the ringing hammer of the archaeologist and the plunging crowbar of the geologist. No more is infidelity characterized by its blasphemy than by its ignorance, but oh! what a high mountain of prejudice against the Bible, against Christianity, against churches, against all evangelizing enterprises—a mountain that casts its long, black shadows over this continent and over all continents. Geographers tell us that Mount Everest is the highest mountain in the world. Oh, no! The Mountain of Prejudice against Christianity is higher than the highest crags that dare the lightnings of heaven. Before our Zerubbabel can it ever become a plain?

Another mountain of hindrance is that of positive and outspoken immorals. There is the Mountain of Inebriacy. It is piled high with kegs and demijohns and decanters and hogsheads, on which sit the victims of that traffic whose one business is to rob earth and heaven of the most generous and large-hearted and splendid of the human race. If their business was to take only the mean and stingy and contemptible and useless, we would not say much against the work, for there are tens of thousands of men and women who are a nuisance to the world, and their obliteration from human society would be an advantage to all that is good. The removal of these moral deficits would not arouse in us much of a protest. But insobriety takes the best. The mountain of Inebriacy stands in the way of the Kingdom of God, and hundreds of thousands of men, but for that hindrance, would step right into the ranks of the Lord's host and march heavenward, each one taking a regiment with him. The Mountain of Inebriacy is not an ordinary mountain; but it is armed. It is a line of fortresses continually blazing away its destructive forces upon all our neighborhoods, towns, and cities, their volleys of death poured down upon the homes and churches. Under this power more than one hundred thousand men and women are in this country every year imprisoned, and an army of six hundred thousand drunkards almost shake the earth with their staggering tread. It causes in this country three hundred murders and four hundred suicides a year. This Mountain of Inebriacy has not only assaulted the land, but bombarded the shipping of the sea, and some of the most appalling shipwrecks on Atlantic and Pacific coast have been the result. What sank the Steamer Rothsay Castle, on the way from Liverpool to Dublin, destroying one hundred human lives? A drunken sea captain. What blew up the Ben Sherrod on the Mississippi and sent one hundred and fifty to horrible death? A drunken crew. What drove on the breakers a steamer making its way from New York to Charleston, and sent whole families, on the way home from summer watering places, to the merciless depths of the sea? A drunken sea captain. Gather up from the depths of the rivers, and lakes, and oceans, the bones of those shipwrecked by intoxicated captains and crews, and you could build out of them a temple of horrors, all the pillars and altars and floors and ceilings fashioned of human skulls. Is it possible that such a Mountain of Inebriacy can ever be made a plain?

Yonder also is the Mountain of Crime, with its strata of fraud, and malpractice, and malfeasance, and blackmail, and burglary, and piracy, and embezzlement, and libertinism, and theft, all its heights manned with the desperadoes, the cut-throats, the pickpockets, the thimble-riggers, the plunderers, the marauders, the pillagers, the corsairs, the wreckers, the bandits, the tricksters, the forgers, the thugs, the garotters, the fire-fiends, the dynamiters, the shoplifters, the kleptomaniacs, the pyromaniacs, the dipsomaniacs, the smugglers, the kidnappers, the Jack Sheppards, the Robert Macaires, and the Macbeths of villainy. The crimes of the world! Am I not right in calling them, when piled up together, a mountain? But we cannot bring ourselves to appreciate great heights except by comparison. You think of Mount Washington as high, especially those of you who ascended as of old, on muleback, or more recently by rail-train, to the Tip Top House. Oh, no! That is not high! For it is only about six thousand feet, whereas, rising on this Western hemisphere are Chimborazo, twenty-one thousand feet high, and Mount Sahama, twenty-three thousand feet high, and Mount Sarota, twenty-four thousand eight hundred feet high. But that is not the highest mountain on the Western Hemisphere. The highest mountain is the Mountain of Crime, and is it possible that this mountain, before our Zerubbabel, can ever be made a plain?

There is also the Mountain of War, the most volcanic of all mountains,—the Vesuvius which, not content, like the Vesuvius of Italy, with whelming two cities, Herculaneum and Pompeii, has covered with its fiery scoria thousands of cities and would like to whelm all the cities of both hemispheres. Give this mountain full utterance, and it would cover up Washington and New York and London as easily as a householder, with his shovel, at ten o'clock at night, banks a grate fire with ashes. This mountain is a pile of fortresses, barricades, and armories, the world's artillery heaped, wheels above wheels, columbiads above columbiads, seventy-four pounders above seventy-four pounders, wrecked nations above wrecked nations. This Mountain of War is not only loaded to cannonade the earth, but it is also a cemetery, holding the corpses of thirty million slain in the wars of Alexander and Cyrus, sixty million slain in Roman wars, one hundred and eighty million slain in war with Turks and Saracens and holding about thirty-five billion corpses, not million but billion, which was the estimate made by Edmund Burke more than a hundred years ago of those who had been destroyed by war, so that you would have to add many more millions now. Twenty years ago a careful author estimated that about fourteen times the then population of the world had gone down in battle or in hospital after battle. Ah! This Mountain of War is not like an ordinary mountain. It is like Kilauea, one of the Sandwich Islands, which holds the greatest volcano in all the earth, and concerning which wrote from the Sandwich Islands a few years ago:

"What a hissing, bellowing, tumbling, soaring force is Kilauea! Lake of unquenchable fire: convolutions and pauxisms of flame: elements of nature in torture: torridity and luridly: congregation of dreads: molten horrors: sulphurous abysses: swirling mystery of all time: infinite turbulence: chimney of perdition: wallowing terrors: fifteen acres of threatening glooms insufferable and Dantesque: cauldon stirred by the champion witch of Pandemonium: camp-fire of the armies of Diabolus: wrath of the mountains in full bloom: shimmering incandescence: pyrotechnics of the planet: furnace-blast of the ages: Kilauca!" But, my friends, mightier, higher, vaster, hotter, more raging is the volcanic Mountain of War. It has been blazing for hundreds of years, and will keep on blazing until, until,—but dare not hazard a prophecy. Can it be that its fires will ever be put out? Can it be that its roar will ever be silenced? Can it be that before our Zerubbabel that blazing mountain will ever become a plain?

There is also the long range of mountains, longer than Appalachian range, longer than Caucasian range, longer than Sierra Nevada range,—the piled-up opposition of bad literature, bad homes, bad institutions, bad amusements, bad centuries, bad religions: Paganism, Hindooism, Buddhism, Mohammedanism, and outtressed and enthroned Godlessness, devoted to ambition and lust and hydra-headed, argus-eyed abomination, as it stands with lifted fist and mocking lips, challenging Jehovah upon the throne of the universe to strike if he dare. Oh, it is a great mountain, as my text declares. There is no use in denying it. The most authentic statistics declare it. The signs of the times prove it. All Christian workers realize it. It is a mountain. "The mountain can never be brought down," says worldly speculation. "The mountain can never be made a plain," says small faith in the churches. Well, let us see. Let us look about for the implements we can lay our hands on. Let us count the number on our side who are willing to dig with a shovel, or bore a tunnel, or blast a rock. Let us see if there is any foreign help that will come in to reinforce us. I do not want to make myself absurd by attempting an impossibility. If it is only one spade at the foot of Mount Blanc; if it is only one arm, capable of lifting but a few pounds, against a mountain that weighs a hundred million tons, let us quit before we make ourselves the travesty and caricature of the universe. If we are to undertake this job, first of all we must have a competent Engineer, one who knows all about excavations, about embankments, about tunnels, about mountains. I know engineers who have carved up mountains, cut down mountains, removed mountains. I will do nothing unless I know who is to be our Engineer. Zerubbabel led at the rebuilding of the ancient Temple, and Matthew Henry, the greatest of commentators, declares that our Zerubbabel is the Lord Jesus Christ. The Zerubbabel of my text was only a type of the glorious and omnipotent Jesus, and as I look up into the face of this Divine Engineer and see it glow with all the splendors of the Godhead, and see that in his arm is the almightiness that flung out all the worlds that glitter in the midnight heavens, and that to lift the Himalayas would cost him no more effort than for me to lift an ounce, my courage begins to rally, and my faith begins to mount, and my enthusiasm is all aflame, and the words of my text this moment just fit my lips and express the triumph of my soul, and I cry out, "Who art thou, O great mountain? before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain."

My experiences with the shovel are that you cannot do much by one push of that implement, and that after you have been digging with it an hour what you have accomplished seems very little; but just go along by the place where they are building a railroad through a mountain and see what a great work a thousand shovels can do, and know that while there are a thousand shovels at work on this side of the mountain there are a thousand shovels busy on the other side, and all I have to do is to manage my own particular shovel. It cheers me to think that against this old Mountain of Sin there are hundreds of thousands and millions of shovels this moment busy, and we are all at work under the one Engineer who came down from his throne in heaven to oversee and help the removal of that mountain, and who has contracted to have it done. I have seen the contract, and He is well paid for it. The compensation promised by the Throne of heaven is, "I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." The reason so many of us are idle is that we want a bigger shovel or we would like to manage some great hydraulic engine. No, brother. Stick to your shovel. Dig away in your Sabbath classes. Dig away in your missions. Dig away in your homes. Dig away in your pulpits. Do the work next to you. Do not spend too much time looking at the great size of the mountains or at the way others use their shovels. All that you can accomplish toward the removing of that mountain will be with your own particular shovel. Remember little David, with Saul's helmet on him, dropping clear down over his ears, even unto his shoulders. But when he got in his hand the boy's sling, how well he used it! If you do not understand Greek, do not attempt to tell the people what the text is in the original. If you do not understand Latin, attempt no drafts upon Latinity. You who want to help in the removal of the mountain, hold on to your shovel. Much time has been lost by the fact that many of the sharpest shovels, instead of being used for the removal of the mountain, have been used in fighting each other. The great Presbyterian church was mightily hindered by the fight that for years went on between Old School shovels and New School shovels, and it was not until the meeting of the General Assembly at Pittsburg, thirty or forty years ago that many good men made up their minds that shovels are not made to fight with but to dig with. Many of the old theologians went around with bandaged foreheads which had not been struck by the swords in the battle for God, but by the shovels of ecclesiastical embroglio. They had a special admiration for that Psalm of David which said, "Blessed be the Lord which teacheth my hands to war, and my fingers to fight." The Methodist Church had a battle of shovels over Lay delegation, and womanly representation. I am glad to say that most of the ecclesiastical pugilists, in all denominations, are dead, and that they had big funerals. But there are so many shovels now rightly engaged that no statistics can count them. I tell you the mountain is coming down. It is coming down rapidly. It will all come down. There are those who hear or read these words who will gaze upon its complete prostration; for what is the use of my keeping back any longer the full statement of the fact, which I have somewhat delayed through lawful sermonic strategy, the fact that the Lord God Almighty, in the full play of his omnipotence, will accomplish this supernal work. If God can build a mountain, I guess he can remove a mountain. After God has given full opportunity for the shovels, He will come in with His thunderbolts. There is the programme. First the shovels, then the thunderbolts. Our's the shovels, God's the thunderbolts. The text, which before we uttered with something of trepidation, now we utter in laugh of triumph, "Who art thou, O great mountain? before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain."

Sometimes a general begins a battle before he is ready, because the enemy forces it on him. The general says, "The enemy are pushing us, and so I open battle. We are not sufficient to cope with them, but I hope the reserve forces will come up in time." The battle rages, and the general looks through his field-glass at the troops, but ever and anon he sweeps his field-glass backward and upward toward the hill, to see if the reserve forces are coming. "Hard pushed are we!" says the general. "I do wish those reinforcements would come up." After awhile the plumes of the advancing cavalry are seen tossing on the ridge of the hill, and then the flash of swords, and then the long lines of mounted troops, their horses in full gallop, and the general says, "All is well. Hold out, my men, a little longer. Let the sergeants ride along the lines and cheer the men and tell them reinforcements are coming." And now the rumbling of the batteries and gun-carriages is distinctly heard, and soon they are in line, and at the first roar of the newly-arrived artillery the enemy, a little while before so jubilant, fall back in wild retreat, their way strewn with canteens and knapsacks and ammunition, that the defeated may be unhindered in their flight. That is just the way now. In this great battle against sin and crime and moral death the enemy seem too much for us. More grogshops than churches. More bad men than good men, and they come up with bravado and the force of great numbers. They have opened battle upon us before we are, in our own strength, ready to meet them, and great are the discouragements. But steady, there! Hold on! Reinforcements are coming. Through the glass of inspiration I look, and see the flash of the sword of "him who hath on his vesture and on his thigh a name written, King of kings and Lord of lords." All heaven is on our side and is coming to the rescue. I hear the rumbling of the King's artillery, louder than any thunder that ever shook the earth, and with every roll of the ponderous wheels our courage augments, and when these reinforcements from heaven get into line with the forces of God already on earth, all the armies of unrighteousness will see that their hour of doom has come, and will waver and fall back and take flight and nothing be left of them save here and there, strewn by the wayside, an agnostic's pen or a broken decanter or a torn playbill of a debasing amusement or a blasphemous paragraph, or a leper's scale, or a dragon's tooth, to show they ever existed. Let there be cheering all along the lines of Christian workers, over the fact that what the shovels fail to do will be accomplished by the thunderbolts. "Who art thou, O great mountain? before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain."

The mountains look on Marathon,
And Marathon looks on the sea,
Shrine of the mighty can it be
That this is all remains of thee!

Save Armenia's Orphans

The Work of Rescue Already Begun. A Great Christian Crusade.

O phase of the great work of Armenian Relief, in which the whole Christian world has been actively engaged for a year past, has aroused deeper sympathy than that which has for its object the rescue of the 50,000 orphan children of the Armenian martyrs from Mohammedan control. Indeed, the movement for their rescue has developed so rapidly, and is characterized by such enthusiasm, that it may truthfully be called a great Christian crusade.

As was stated in last week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, there is now on foot a movement to establish Christian Orphanages at several cities, for the helpless Armenian children, and contributions have already begun to flow in from Europe and America for their founding and support. Our readers have been steadily in the van in the Armenian relief work, and they have now an opportunity of still further aiding this worthy cause by helping to succor the orphans of Oorfa, whose pitiful case was set forth in these columns last week. Miss Corinna Shattuck, the American Board missionary at Oorfa, to whom the first $1,000 was cabled for the orphan work, has doubtless already begun operations, and we may soon expect to hear cheering reports from that city. It will cost about $25 to clothe, feed, support and educate one of these orphans for a year.

There are other Armenian cities whose orphan roll is almost as appalling as that of Oorfa. At Van, where there are 2,000 helpless orphans in the city and about 7,500 in the villages, funds have been received from England, Switzerland, France, and elsewhere, to aid in their support. One missionary writes:

What is to become of them? If help is not extended to them a large proportion will perish before Spring. Many more, especially of the girls, will fall into Moslem hands, and you can imagine something of the moral degradation which that implies. For very few of the remainder can it be hoped that they will receive the education and religious training that will make them Christians, or useful members of society. But as I see the bright, attractive faces surmounting these rags, I think what possibilities are before them, if sweet Charity can envelope them in her arms of love, care for and train them.

The Boldness of Peter and John.

Sunday School Lesson for Jan. 31.
Acts 4: 1-22. Golden Text, Acts 4:
12. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WHILE the power of God was being manifested among the multitude, and the number of believers in the risen and glorified Christ had so augmented that the number of men, not reckoning women and children, had risen to five thousand, opposition and persecution were preparing among the priestly party. If Jesus of Nazareth were indeed the Christ; if his life and teaching were of God, then both the lives and the teaching of the priests were condemned by their extreme contrast; and all their power was at an end. To acknowledge Jesus was for them, as for others, to lose all; and for this they were not prepared. The tidings of what had happened to the lame man had reached them; no time was to be lost, this thing must be stopped. Making common cause with the Sadducees, who were equally condemned with them by the holy life and by the divine power of the Lord Jesus, they "came upon" Peter and John while they were yet speaking in the Holy Ghost to the multitude which had gathered around them and the healed man.

was that they taught the people, and preached through Jesus the resurrection from the dead. The two disciples had nothing to lose, all they had possessed, their ships and their nets, had been left long ago to follow Christ; and what they had received of God could not be taken away from them. The ecclesiastics had everything to lose, their position, their reputation, their authority, and even their very bread, for if they did not get the titles, and their share of the offerings, they were ruined men. To them God was not a real Father, a true Jehovah Jireh; if they did not look out for themselves, they had no confidence that God would care for them, while the two disciples had already gone through the experience of going forth without scrip, or purse, or other resource, but a faithful God, and they had lacked nothing. Emboldened by their unjust apprehension of the Lord Jesus, the priestly dignitaries laid hand on the disciples and put them in hold until the next day, for it was now eventide. Ever since the ninth hour when the miracle took place, until now, probably about six or seven P.M., the disciples had been teaching Jesus and the resurrection to the assembled people.

It is more than probable that Peter and John passed a much more peaceful night in the prison than did their persecutors, who, very likely, were engaged far into the night in gathering together their resources. On the morrow "their rulers, and elders, and scribes, and Annas the high priest, and Caiaphas, and John, and Alexander, and as many as were of the kindred of the high priest, were gathered together at Jerusalem." All these dignitaries and men of influence combined to overcome the power and influence of two unlearned fishermen! Why? They had within them the mighty and invincible power of the Holy Ghost, which their judges felt but would not acknowledge. It was the first time the disciples had been delivered up to the councils and "brought before governors for Christ's sake, and they were now to come into the inheritance of the promise. When they deliver you up, take no thought how or what ye shall speak; for it shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall speak. For it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father that speaketh in you." (Matt. 10: 19, 20). "By what power or in what name have ye done this?" was in the official examination. "Then Peter," not of himself, but "filled with the Holy Ghost, said unto them, Ye rulers of the people, and elders, if we this day are examined concerning a good deed done to an impotent man"—prosecuted for giving a man power to earn his living, a strange indictment!—"in whom this man is made whole; be it known unto you all, and to all the people of Israel, that in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom ye crucified, whom God raised from the dead, even in him doth this man stand here before you whole." No apology: none was needed. No accepting of credit personally! Peter and John were witnesses of Another, and their testimony was to him. They spoke as they believed and knew. He who had promised to be with them "all the days, even unto the consummation of the age" (Matt. 28: 20 R.V., margin), was with them in the healing of the man, and his power, not theirs, healed and upheld the former cripple: in him he was made whole. The Lord was working with them, and confirming his word with signs following as he had promised.

The tables were turned; the object of the prosecution was to prove against the prisoners that they had acted contrary to the authority of the priests; but the prisoners filled with the Holy Ghost brought an indictment against their judges which they were unable to meet. Judged by God, present in his servants, they were convicted and found guilty. "The name of Jesus whom ye crucified, and whom God raised up, has been and authority which healed this man. You, leaders of the people, have taken upon you to crucify God's Christ, but God is greater than you, and has raised him from the dead." "This is the Stone which was set at naught of you builders, which is become the head of the corner." (R.V.) "Neither is there salvation in any other; for there is none other name under heaven whereby we must be saved." What could be more convincing, and yet these men were not convinced! Their whole aim was to maintain their power and position before men, it was not their concern to know the truth. O how blind are they who will not come face to face with God!

But the presence of Peter and John left an impression which was irresistible. They could not account for the boldness of these ignorant men. Who taught them to speak thus? What was it that made them speak with an authority which they, the teachers of the people, could not and dared not assume? There was but one way of accounting for it: they had been with Jesus, and the mantle of Jesus had fallen upon them. But their judges little knew that him whom they thought they had disposed of was himself dwelling in the men by the Holy Ghost; they not only had been with Jesus, but Jesus was with them now. In the eyes of the chief priests the fact that they had been with Jesus was their greatest condemnation. But a stubborn fact had to be dealt with: the power which the priests had thought to bury in the grave of Jesus lived and acted still; and this healed man who had been lame from his mother's womb, was the unanswerable evidence of it. For very shame with the man standing there, "they could say nothing against it. But giving order for the prisoners to withdraw, these great men conferred among themselves." O if they had taken counsel with God, how different might have been the result! When men really believe in God, and can put their cause in his hands, they can never be at their wits' end. "What shall we do to these men?" was their helpless enquiry, "for that indeed a notable miracle hath been done by them is manifest to all them that dwell at Jerusalem, and we cannot deny it, but that it spread no further among the people, let us strictly threaten them that they speak henceforth to no man in this name." "That it spread no further." Why should it not spread? What would be the danger to the people of the teaching and the working of Jesus of Nazareth? Would an immediate contact with God, independent of priests or scribes, a real life in touch with heaven be so dangerous? Alas! generally "the powers that be" of church or state, in all ages of the world have thought so, and the princes of this world have had the Lord of glory.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

HOW strangely the trouble came on the two Apostles! Here were two men quietly going up to the Temple to pray, and they pass the night in jail. We never know what a day may bring forth. The miracle, however, was done; there had been teaching, too, and some had believed. The evening of a man's life may be in darkness, or silence, or weakness and incapacity, but if he did his work in the morning he need not be distressed. His work will live even when he is silenced. The imprisonment of the two men was a punishment for their preaching. The Sadducees were exasperated with it. They were the rich, influential agnostics of their day. Christ had found his worst enemies among the Pharisees because his teaching had been a denunciation of self-seeking, pride, ambition and hypocrisy; but the Apostles aroused chiefly the opposition of the Sadducees because they preached that Jesus had risen from the dead. The Sadducees held that death ends all, and they saw that if the people came to believe that one man had risen from the dead, they would put no faith in the Sadducean doctrine, and their influence would be gone. Their representatives in this age are similarly disturbed. No doctrine is so offensive to them as that of a future life. So the Captain of the Temple (not the man mentioned in Acts 21: 31, who was a Roman whose quarters were in the Tower of Antonia, and whose functions were simply to suppress disorder and civil riot), a functionary of police set by the Jews to see that the Temple was not profaned, was prompted to arrest them. They were shut up all night and were brought in the morning before an executive committee of the Sanhedrim—the Jewish Supreme Court. It was not the full council, but a packed court of the Sadducean party. Annas, whom the Jews recognized as the High Priest, though he had been deposed by the Romans, and Caiaphas, whom the Romans had appointed in his stead, were both in attendance, and with them relatives and friends who were in sympathy with them. One might have expected that Peter, who had quailed before a maid-servant and had lied in his timidity, would have been awed by being brought before these august personages. But his answer shows a courage that is marvelous. His first words debately turn the tables on his judges. He declares that they have imprisoned him and are now arranging him for performing a good deed. They had put a question to him, however, as they did to Christ, to make his answer the basis of an indictment. "By what power or by what name have ye done this?" "By the name of Jesus whom ye crucified." The answer must have put his life in peril, but he makes it pointed and personal, and in eloquent words goes on to state unambiguously doctrines the most offensive he could have uttered in that court. It is strange that he should have escaped punishment, but he did. Perhaps one reason was that the healed man was there to testify. The court could not argue away that fact. A great preacher points out how important it is to have such testimony. When Christianity is assailed and put on its trial it will be vindicated if it can produce men whose lives have been changed, hungry men whom it has fed, men in trouble whom it has consoled. Have your man to testify and the enemies of Christ, like these judges, seeing the man who has been delivered from his drunkenness, his vices amended, a decent man, standing with you can say nothing against it.

The stone set at naught of you builders. Peter alluded to a tradition familiar to every Jew. It was that when the temple was being built a beautifully carved stone arrived with others from the distant quarry. Every stone was fitted into its place in the edifice, but this particular stone seemed to have no place. It was so peculiar in shape and so different from all the others that the masons did not know what to do with it. The masons admired it but thought it only a splendid piece of folly, and left it among the rubbish, where dust accumulated on it and the moss grew on it. When the beautiful building was finished and Solomon was making his last inspection, he looked up at the east tower as if expecting to see something that would please him. "Why is this neglect?" inquired the king in indignant surprise. "Where is the stone I sent for the head of this corner?" Then the frightened workmen bethought them of the rejected stone and hurriedly sought it. It was found cleared of its defilement and hoisted to its place of honor. All declared that it was the one stone needed to give grace and beauty to the completed structure.

Neither is there salvation in any other. When Dr. Chalmers was leaving Kilmer he mentioned in his farewell address significant experience. At his first coming to the parish he preached sound morality. With all the force of his eloquent nature he denounced sin and warned the people against breaking God's holy law. "I never heard," he said afterwards, "of single reformation being effected by the sermons. I am not sensible that all the vehemence with which I urged the virtues and duties of life ever had the weight of feather on the moral habits of my parishioners." But a change came in his life and he began to preach the life and power of Christ. At once there were results. His people broken in spirit, repented and renounced their sins. He said at the end of his ministry in Kilmer, "You have taught me that the effect of way of preaching morality is to preach Christ."

They were unlearned and ignorant men. That is they had no rabbinical knowledge which was the only knowledge these judges held in esteem. They were laymen trained in the theological schools. In some times such men have more wisdom in practical work than the scholars. So years ago a man was carried away by flood. He floated down the stream and it bore him, as he and others thought, with rare good fortune to a tree, which he seized and climbed to a branch, where he sat and waited to be rescued. But no one dared venture out on that turbulent stream. Any boat would be swept down or overturned. At sunset the man was still sitting there, but in the morning the tree had disappeared. While the people on the shore were deploring his fate a man came along who was considered a wit. "I could have saved him if I had been here," he said. "You! How?" "I would have made a float and tied a rope to it and have started it up the river where it would strike the tree and have pulled the man out with the rope." The people looked at one another in chagrin. No one had thought of that plan. It is not always the most learned and eloquent men who are most successful in saving souls. Many a humble mission-hall a poor, ignorant layman full of love for Christ and with faith in his power, can win souls that the great preachers could not reach.

INDIA'S STARVING MILLIONS.

The Christian Herald's Correspondent Describes the Scenes of Suffering, the People, and the Measures being taken for their Relief.

TWO months ago, when the reports of the appalling destitution in India indicated the widespread extent of the calamity. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, desiring to lay the exact facts before its readers, cabled to Mr. Benjamin Benjamin, a Christian journalist in Calcutta, commissioning him to visit the districts affected, and write the facts as he saw them. He accepted the commission and personally visited the famine-stricken region. The first of a series of letters from him we give here, with photographs taken on his order on the spot specially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. These are the first authentic photographs of the suffering people that have ever been published.

Our Correspondent's Letter.

In the Vicinity of Bhopal.—A rough idea of the part of India affected by the present famine may be formed by beginning in the northwest, the Punjab, and running a line about one-third of the width of the country right down to about one-fourth of the distance from Cape Comorin. About the middle of India this band should bend ed by keeping straight down it will avoid the whole west coast, leading to several circumstances which would be tedious to go into. The parts of the area indicated are not equally affected; while certain parts outside of the area are suffering conspicuously. The great indigo region of Behar and parts of both Assam.

The course of the famine, which is only beginning, is seen this: here are, in the rain, two harvests in India: the autumn harvest, grown under the heavy monsoon rains of June to September; and the spring harvest, grown under the lighter rains of December and January. The cultivator watches each all of rain with daily anxiety. For it is not enough that the rain be abundant; it must be properly distributed. If the first fall be too long deferred, the grain cannot be sown; if there be a drought of some weeks after the grain is sown, the young plants die; and if rains cease too early, the crop does not ripen. Well, the monsoon rains of the present year were very scanty in some parts, and while exceedingly abundant in others, failed altogether a month before the usual time. The result was that prices went up, people in moderate circumstances began to feel the pinch, and the mass whose means just suffice to sustain life in ordinary years, began to starve. The government was on the alert, and received weekly reports by telegraph from every part of the country, of the state of the crops and the rise of prices. Extensive schemes for making new roads, excavating tanks, filling up marshes, clearing away jungle, and breaking stones for road metal, all to give employment to the people, were got ready, and orders went forth not to consider the cost, but to start the work one after another as soon as the scarcity made itself felt. Orders were also issued and funds allotted for the opening of poor-houses at suitable points throughout the affected area, to feed gratuitously those too weak for any kind of work, and especially the children, thousands of whom are losing their parents by death or desertion. Special European officers were appointed to have charge of both these measures of relief, with a perfect army of native supervisors and servants under them.

But it is one thing to organize relief measures, and a very different thing to induce the people to take advantage of them. When we have to deal with a population six times that of the United States, and crowded into a country no larger than the United States east of the Mississippi, it is surprising how quickly a few thousands can die without producing more than a ripple on the surface of life. The stupid stubbornness of the people passes belief, and is only accepted as a fact by Europeans who are here to see the way they act. Fatalism, superstition, prejudice, and indolence combined make multitudes of them take their chances of begging rather than leave their place of abode to go on a relief work; and at the poor-houses the starving people have such a mania for wandering all over the country that they do not get back for a second meal till they have gone perhaps two days without food; and their condition is then such that half of them die in a few days. So many people died on the roadsides and in the fields in August and September, that an imperative rule has been made requiring paupers to remain at the poor-houses if they are to spring harvest. The first rain fell about ten days ago, very copiously in some parts. But it is found that over a full half of those parts the people had either eaten their grain for sowing, or had failed to sow it from mistrust that there would be any rain. In other parts there has been either no rain at all or an insignificant fall; so that even where the people had grain to sow and had sown it, no plants have come up. Thus the prospect for February and March, and then straight on till June, is truly awful. Much interest has been excited in India by the export of several ship loads of wheat from San Francisco for this market, purely as a mercantile operation. It will certainly bring local prices down a little.

Bhopal, where I am writing, is the capital of a Mohammedan State, independent of the British Government. The population is Hindoo, but the government is Mohammedan. It is the ninth centre I have visited since setting out from Calcutta; and I am working northward. Of these nine places, I have found the severest distress in Jabalpur (also spelled Jubbulpore). It is a large city and an important railroad junction, a little to the northeast of the centre of India. Sixteen hundred people are daily fed at the poor-house, and the accompanying photographs show two groups of the worst specimens of the inmates. They were specially taken to my order last week, and were sent to me after I left Jabalpur. I wished to have a third picture of the more pleasing sight of the paupers at their food; but the photographer had a long way to go to the poor-house, and it did not then happen to be the dinner hour.* BENJAMIN AITKEN.

scriptions, headed by the Queen with a gift of twenty-five hundred dollars, are being raised. But the need is so stupendous: and the men and women and children are dying. Christianity ought to be distinctly represented in the work of relief. These Hindoos and Mohammedans should know that when Christian people heard of their extremity they would not wait for the Government to act, but out of their own pockets contributed to provide the hungry with bread. This is an opportunity to give them practical proof of the love and kindness of the Christian religion, which should not be missed. Every Christian missionary in India ought to have the means in his hand to feed every starving creature whom he sees. Such help rendered now will be the most effective sermon he has ever preached. It will be a proof of love that will never be forgotten in India, a practical evidence that Christians are followers of him who commanded that the hungry should be fed in his name. Many a starving native who thus receives food will bless the name of Jesus for giving the command, and will be prepared to listen to the Gospel of the Being in whose name they have been fed. From men of their own faith the sufferers are little likely to receive substantial help, but they look hopefully to the missionaries who have come to them from America to preach to them of the Bread of Life. One missionary writes that he has had children brought to him in baskets, so weak from starvation that they could not stand, begging that he would give them food to save them from dying. Grown men and women have come, so thin that their bones almost protruded from the skin. It is heart-rending to resist the piteous appeals for food from such sufferers; but to enable the missionaries to give this relief a large sum of money must be put in their hands without a day's delay. Happily there is food to be had if the missionaries had the money to buy it. This they can have speedily if the Christian people of America will subscribe as they have done for other suffering peoples. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be glad to forward all sums sent for the purpose.

be fed at all. This beneficent rule, although it looks like imprisonment, has practically stopped the people dying all over the country. They continue to die at the poor-houses, but that is the result of previous starvation, or of diseases—sometimes gangrene of the intestines—produced by long want of food. Quite often the first meal causes dysentery and death.

I do not say that all the poor-houses are managed as well as they ought to be. Of the hundreds of employees paid for looking after them, all are not honest; all the honest are not compassionate; and all the compassionate are not clever or diligent. But I am convinced that the best is being done for the starving population that it is possible to do. Besides, it is rare to find a native concerning himself about another native who is not of his own caste. As for the educated natives, who form a separate class by themselves, many of them are earnestly co-operating in measures of relief with the European officers, who are distracted with overwork and anxiety.

What renders the prospect now most serious is the threatened failure of the

Our correspondent's letter was written from an up-country district where the famine was likely to be severely felt. The premonitions he expresses in his letter of the large fatality have proved true. The cable brings the shocking news that in the Jabalpur district ninety thousand persons have died of want. It is evident that food ought to be sent there immediately to save the other inhabitants of the district of whom there are two millions. It is gratifying to learn that the English Government is doing so much for the sufferers, and we are glad to see that private sub-

UNHAPPY MORMON HOMES.

Mothers Sad for their Daughters' Future—A Social and Religious Blight on Womanhood—Polygamy's Foes in Utah.

WHAT revelations Mormon women could give of their sufferings in polygamous homes! Indeed not a few of their harrowing tales have found their way into literature. The facts need nothing added by imagination to increase their disclosure of suffering. Many a young and happy pair, married elsewhere, have been beguiled into Mormonism, located in Utah, and yielding to polygamy under the iron hand of its leaders, have drawn out the rest of their days in misery. The man is occupied and diverted with various duties and under the influence of force and a mixture of deceptive and degrading motives, has yielded and suffered less perchance than the wife whose sphere is more restricted, and is not consulted, as one wife labor of all the wives supported the husband. Contrast one of these families with a monogamous home where the pure and happy life of husband and wife, parent and child accord with the exalted teachings of Christianity. Every one who shares it, declares in truth, "there is no place like home." It is the resort

Of love, of peace, of plenty, where

Mingle into bliss.

However humble, it is the centre of motives to effort. It nerves the arm of industry and inspires the heart to virtue. No wonder that philosophers rank it with the Church and the State, as one of the three divine foundations of human affairs. Where, beside in Mormonism, has woman been more terribly crushed? Does her nature ever become so perverted that she claims to see in plural marriage her exaltation and joy? It is only a final sign of her utter degradation. In the family of Mohammedanism or the further Orient, to whatever polygamy may degrade her in this life, it leaves her existence beyond the grave un-manifesto was issued suspending plural marriages. In their earnest efforts to make good this manifesto is the hope of their future. Polygamy rooted out, this source of corruption gone, this appeal to "animalism" ended, and the Bible still recognized among their sacred books, it may be hoped that other destructive notions which help to make up the illogical mixture of beliefs often contradictory in their statement, known as the Mormon religion may more and more lose hold upon its adherents, the tyranny of leaders be thrown off, and the personal rights guaranteed under the American Constitution, be asserted and enjoyed. The common desire to prolong this life, to get the most out of it often operates to correct destructive ideas and habits. The moment one human mind yields itself unthinkingly to the direction of another, as the Mormon leaders have required, that instant it is no longer itself, it is perverted, it loses its essential freedom. No one can predict what it will do. In the midst of life's temptations it is likely to drift to its own destruction and become the ruin of others. Out of such a body of individuals would it be reasonable to expect a happy, self-respecting, virtuous community? All the great forces circumstances, there has been a wide diversity of feeling. It shows what the leader would do if they dared, and at the same time how liberal Mormons are daring to think for themselves. In the recent conference of his state the quarrel over resolutions to condemn him was bitter his political party convention, however, was heartily sustained by the young liberal Mormons.

JOHN EATON.

A Remarkable Shipmaster

Mr. F. A. Abbot, of the Galve News, who was a passenger on the steamer "Comanche," from Jacksonville to New York, last month, writes thus of L. Pennington, the commander of the vessel: "Captain Pennington has been known many years in this country and port Europe as a most wonderfully constituted Christian man and even his steam run on those principles—service held on board by himself every Sabbath that he is at sea, and hundreds have known to gather in the cabin of the vessel to hear him. He was converted under Falmagne's preaching. Missions have been established by this extraordinary man, much good work done. The foundation of his work is faith, believing that his words, 'according to thy faith be it after another darkens the door of her home and crushes hope out of her heart. Can it be a surprise that one declares she has "suffered ten thousand deaths?" Every touch of the life around her is agony, but she is not distressed for herself alone. She has daughters, and every thought of them tells her that her agony is to be refreshed in their lives. Is it strange, as she looks on the little graves in the cemetery near her home, that she sighs that her little ones might find there a safe retreat under little green mounds, from the fate which is consuming her own life? It has been well said that "from the day that Sarah turned Hagar from her door and drove her into the wilderness with her offspring, there was never a time in woman's history when she desired to share her husband with another woman, and there never was a day when that husband could please two wives. The relationship is false." "Were the man an angel, it would be impossible for him to act justly towards two or twenty wives." Can language describe or the imagination picture the life of a family and of the several children belonging to each, housed in a single roomed primitive log cabin? This was too much for Mormonism even, and a new room came to be added with each wife, and so there would come the long, one-storied house with a separate room chimney and door for each family, the man residing with each in turn as he chose. In farming districts, perhaps, each wife was assigned a portion of tillage for her own cultivation; and not infrequently the joint controlled by her polygamous relations. But Mormonism places its destroying hand on her eternally. It does not allow her the same redemption as man through the blood of the Saviour. She must marry to be saved or exalted. Indeed, her exaltation is made to depend upon the number of times her husband is married. She is to have children in the next world as in this. Some point to woman suffrage in Utah as a sign of her privileges. But is it not more a sign that she can only do another act as man dictates! I must not pause to dwell upon the effect of a polygamous home upon the training of its children. Marriages, it must be remembered, can be performed only in the Endowment House in secret, thus losing the beneficent effects of publicity. Daughters of more wealthy families, educated outside of Utah, long ago often resisted plural marriage. To them the destruction of which exalt character would be let down, loosened, become inoperative and manhood and womanhood be irretrievably lost. Character would become dependent upon external directing forces, and when they are withdrawn it would collapse and disappear. Every consideration urges young Mormons toward the Bible. Their plans formed according to its moral precepts will realize their only safety. It should be remembered that the so-called "Josephites" have never accepted polygamy. This, together with the revelation or manifesto issued against it a few years ago, offers ground for those among Mormons to stand upon, who resist a return to the practice. Another fact of great significance and calculated to break the force of church tyranny is the exclusion of Moses Thatcher from apostleship for not signing the manifesto claiming church control of the nomination of church officers for civil office. Moses Thatcher has long been an apostle and an eminent church leader, and greatly trusted. Last fall he became a candidate for United States Senator under Statehood, and the understanding is that he did it without the consent of the church authorities. When this recent manifesto was issued, signed by the three presidents and all of the apostles but Thatcher, and it was presented to him on his sick bed with an hour and a half to consider it and return it; he returned it without his signature, declaring the signing of it would stultify himself. On the question of his expulsion from apostleship under the cir-polygamy was a most happy relief. Indeed, the great body of younger Mormons have seemed to feel that an awful church weight fell off from their lives when the thee," hold as good to-day as when they were spoken. Captain Pennington's first number up in the thousands, and are probably those in Galveston to who will call him to mind as he has commanded several vessels in long years to that port."

"Charity" Carved in Snow

A few years ago, on a very cold winter day, the people of Stockholm, the capital of Sweden, were surprised, so the story runs, at seeing a high fence raised up in the public parks, behind which was to be seen a figure in snow. The news spread that this figure was from the hand of a sculptor, who invited people to come and look at it for a voluntary entrance fee, which was devoted to charity. Thousands of people came. There stood the form of a majesty, a male figure, moulded in white, blinding snow; her features beaming with love and kindness. This figure represented "Charity," and around her stood smaller figures in snow of little children, with thin and torn garments, receiving presents from her hands. Spring at last came and its advent the beautiful figure disappeared. But "Charity" had served a good purpose by bringing in 16,000 crowns, or $200,000.

THE RED MAN AND THE GOSPEL.

Indian Tribes, Once Savage, Gradually Coming Under Civilizing and Christianizing Influences—Set-Backs to Progress.

AN INDIAN BOY.

IN no country in the world have savage tribes been more quickly transformed, under Gospel and educative influences, to quiet and law-abiding citizens, than in our own land, where Indian tribes, which, a few years ago, were wild and rebellious, are now living at peace with the rest of mankind. To this end many causes have contributed, and it has been reached in spite of many obstacles. After the pioneer came the missionary, and following him, the teacher; and now it may be truthfully said that, with the exception of a few scattering tribal remnants in remote parts of the North-west and South-west, our red men are fairly under the beneficent influence of a Christian civilization. To such noble workers as Sheldon Jackson, founder of many schools and mission stations among the Indians from Alaska to New Mexico; to the brave missionaries of the various Christian denominations who have settled schools in many cities, and to the sterling and devoted workers of the American Sunday School Union, widely distributed in the "Indian country," as well as in the old and settled States, these results are mainly due, under Providence. Nor should the splendid work of the Carlisle Indian School and Hampton Institute be overlooked, for these institutions have trained and educated many hundreds of red-men and women, and sent them out as living examples and teachers among their dusky kindred. In twenty-five years this transforming process has been steadily progressing at Hampton, and both there and at Carlisle the impetus afforded to Indian progress has made a very marked change in the aspects of the Indian race. Not only are many Indian youths of both sexes emancipated from the ignorance and foolish traditions of their ancestors, but a very large proportion have become sound, useful Christians. In an address delivered some time ago at Washington, Bishop Doane, of North Dakota, said: "There are men who tell me if it is not a fact that the Indians, when converted in the Western Schools, lapse on returning West. My answer is that a converted Indian is generally a truer Christian than an average white man. I speak from practical knowledge. I know they are willing to make sacrifices for their faith that the white man is not. When they know what Christianity brings them in this life and in the life to come, they long to have their friends know the truth that is such a source of peace to them. I was called to a place on the Grand Ball River, and there I found a group of about fifty men and women. Among them were three young fellows who had been at Hampton, and one who had been at another school. They came back from school, and had converted the people together, and told them the happiness of becoming Christians. For a year or more they had gathered the people together week by week, and I found to my amazement that these young men who had been at Hampton had become so infused with the Christian idea, that I had taught them so much religion, that I could safely admit all who presented themselves for holy baptism, and then I there I admitted them into the Christian Church. That shows that the influence of that school goes out in ways we know not of."

Life in an Indian village, such as that which our artist has shown in the colored illustration on the first page of this issue, has its picturesque side, but it has also many discomforts, even to the Indians themselves. Such villages, now becoming rarer every year, are giving place to the comfortable frame structures that are now to be found in many parts of the Indian country, affording evidence of the steady progress of the race in civilization. Instead of the smoky tent or tepee, with its foul-smelling interior and utter lack of cleanly surroundings, the squaw and papoose have the neat wooden cabin with its cookstove, and the piece of cultivated ground adjoining shows that the Indian is making at least some use of his new opportunities and agricultural training. Of course it will be a long time before the red-men, as a whole, reach the point of absolute self-support, and the government must continue to dole out regular rations for many years to come. This vivid picture by a missionary, of a semi-civilized Indian settlement, gives an idea how that system operates. It is little if any better than the old wigwam system, but the infusion of education in the red-men's homes is working a gradual improvement:

These people draw their beef on Saturday, their bread, sugar and coffee, etc., on Monday. On Saturday and Sabbath they gorge themselves with beef. They add quantities of coffee, strong as lye, to it on Monday, and they eat until all is gone. Then, for about five days, they have almost nothing to eat, often eating boiled corn alone for days; and if the corn is scarce, they go hungry. This, of course, weakens the system, and brings on disease. In winter, the cabin is kept hot as a furnace, and the air is thick with disease germs. Will anyone say that such surroundings are healthy? Unless Christian homes are built among the people and they are taught the value of cleanliness and pure air, they will all die. The old-time Indian here smoked, but not tobacco. He had the bark of the red willow. The Indian of to-day, from the five-year are practically neglected. Not a hundred miles from the agency are Indians who declare that they have never derived any benefit from the annual issue of tools, windows or doors, and sometimes wagons and harness, which the Government makes at the agency. There is not an axe or shovel in that part of the reservation that

New Testaments, in their own language, was sent to them. Now they are reading the Gospel story in their own language.

In a report issued a few days ago by Prof. Meserve of Shaw University, Raleigh, N. C., on the investigation by the Congressional Commission known as the Dawes Commission, into the condition of YOUNG CHIPPEWA CANOE-BUILDERS AT WORK.

"Washington" gave to them. A few have axes and shovels bought of traders. It is impossible, under the circumstances, for such Indians to make equal progress with those who are generously equipped with tools, clothed, fed and educated at Government expense.

Much of the work of the American Sunday School Union missionaries in the west lies in the Indian country. Missionary J. P. Lane writes from Oklahoma as follows:

I have recently returned from the Indian Territory, where I started a school near a place called "Robbers' Roost," where robberies were once common at a camping place near a spring. Things are not so bad there now, but horse and cattle stealing are common. This is a needy field in many respects. Some of the people are very poor. The land all be-

"the five civilized tribes" in the Indian Territory (the Cherokees, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, and Seminoles), some very interesting facts as to the condition of the tribes are brought to light. Prof. Meserve discovered that the Reservation Indians were largely at the mercy of land speculators and swindlers and that while civilization had doubtless accomplished much for them, it had introduced a host of evils unheard of before. Instead of the land being held in common, various arrangements were in operation between Indians and whites in violation of the law. Monopolists, white and red, controlled almost the entire product of the territory. Crime and corruption were rampant and in a single year there had been 100 murders in the Choctaw Nation alone. The courts had failed to bring offenders to trial or to punish them. These abuses, in larger part, were the result of the Government's failure to afford proper protection to the Indian as guaranteed by the treaties. Prof. Meserve admits that, with due protection, the Five Nations would in all likelihood make quite a different record. He says:

I have met Indians of these five tribes, who were well dressed, and have business qualifications of a high order, who speak English well, who are Christians, and in every way capable and honored citizens. This shows what the Indian is capable of, but the condition of affairs has come to be such that heroic measures must be taken.

Allotment of land to Indian adults, under such restrictions to make it inalienable, he believes would go very far towards remedying present evils. Of course until some remedial legislation is adopted, the progress of civilization and Gospel teaching among the Five Nations will be retarded by many obstacles of the character indicated.

Our illustrations on this page are interesting in connection with the subject. The Ute chiefs are types of a warlike tribe now fast being civilized. In the group of Chippewa boat-builders the young bucks are seen at a favorite employment at which they are very skillful. Even the civilized Indian loves to hunt or fish, and a holiday in the woods or on the lake or river is to him a keen delight.

At the present time the chief tribes who are receiving the benefits of education and the Gospel, and who have made the greatest progress are the Utes, Cheyennes, Sissetons, Lower Brule, Crows, Creeks, Yanktons, Cherokees, Arapahoes, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Osages, Poncas, Winnebagoes, Omahas, Kaws, the Kickapoos, Kiowas, Pottawatomies, Sac Foxes, Seminoles, and in smaller degree the Comanches and Apaches. All of these tribes have reservations in North and South Dakota and the Indian Territory.

old boy to the great grandfather, will smoke tobacco pipes and cigarettes. This brings to the children the worst form of nervous disease.

Fortunately, not all the Indian villages are like this. An instance of the better type is the Navajo Mission at Holyoke, Utah, where the farm houses are neat and well kept, the children healthy and the adults well behaved. The Navajos number from sixteen to twenty thousand souls, scattered over a large reservation and adjoining country, in the borders of Arizona, New Mexico and Utah. As they subsist entirely upon their flocks of sheep and goats, and the little corn and wheat a few of them raise in places where water for irrigation can be obtained—for the Government does not give them rations—they are naturally compelled to settle where they can get pasture and water for their flocks. In the country surrounding the agency the forests are utilized for the Indians' benefit, a saw mill being run by the Government for the sawing of lumber. But there are others of the same tribe who longs to the Indians. Sometimes a large family will be in a small house of one or two rooms, and perhaps a dirty floor. I met one white trader and one itinerant minister who could not read or write,—their wives did for both of them. One superintendent and an assistant superintendent of another school believe the earth is flat, and that the sun runs. In their homes the children gather about me in numbers, anxious for papers, cards, etc. They stand on my feet, climb on my knees, take out my watch, or examine the cloth in my coat and vest; all this, regardless of the mud on their feet, or the mixture of grease, sorghum, and soil on their hands, feet, and clothes. Several talk at once, some laugh and the smaller ones cry, while the parents and myself try to be heard. The same is common at the table, and talking in church is frequent.

Some time ago, a young Indian, was converted in one of the Union Sunday Schools established by James Stanaway, in the upper peninsula of Michigan. He was anxious to make known the Gospel to the old men of the tribe, but they could not understand the story in English, or read the English Bible. So a supply of Dead War-Eagles.

THE clouds of war are nearly all vanished from our skies. With all the sad experience of other nations before it, every government must learn, amid tears and agony, that war is ruin—individual, domestic, social, financial, moral—and that defeat is often only a little worse than victory. The time will come when arbitration will take the place of gunpowder and keen steel. So long ago as the time of William Penn the efficacy of arbitration was demonstrated. He proposed to come to America, and without any weapons treat with the worst savages. Charles II. scoffed at him, and said, "What! Venture yourself among the savages of North America! Why, man! What security have you that you will not be in their war kettle within two hours after setting foot on their shores?" "The best security in the world," said William Penn. "I doubt that, friend William," said the King. "I have no idea of any security against these cannibals but a regiment of good soldiers with their muskets and bayonets, and I tell you beforehand, with all my good will for you and your family, to whom I am under obligation, I will not send a single soldier with you." "I want none of your soldiers," said Penn. "I depend on something better." "On what?" asked the King. William Penn answered, "On the Indians themselves, on their moral sense, and on the promised protection of God." It is a fact in American history that for seventy years the red men kept the treaty, and it was not broken until the white men broke it. Now, if the treaty made between William Penn and American savages could last seventy years certainly intelligent nations ought to be able to keep the peace. In most wars the question at issue is as undecided after as before the bloodshed. In our war with Great Britain in 1812 the question involved was the impressment of American seamen. Two years, and a-half of war raged, our Government expended three hundred million dollars and lost thousands of lives, and the question still remained about the impressment of American sailors. Some say wars are necessary to clear off the surplus population of the earth, and had it not been for the hundreds of millions slain in battle, the earth would have been too crowded with inhabitants, but my opinion is that people die fast enough. With the cholera and yellow fevers and pneumonias and consumption and typhoids, and the cyclones and the shipwrecks and the earthquakes, depopulation need not be accelerated. The best thing you can do with a man is to save him, and the worst thing you can do with a man is to kill him.

Clinton's Ditch.

THE most of the Northern canals are closed. How strange that commerce should feel the closing for a few months of "De Witt Clinton's Ditch," for so the canal was nicknamed when it was first suggested. No one supposed it would ever be completed, and a common proverb of the day was, "If I can live until Clinton's Ditch is done, I shall be content." A popular epigram in regard to it appeared:

Oh, a ditch he would dig from the lakes to the sea,
The eighth of the world's matchless wonder to be.

Good land! How absurd! But why should you grieve?

It will do to bury its mad author in.

Nevertheless, the work went on to its completion, and on October 26, 1825, it was opened with procession and cannonade. The Governor of the State and prominent officials took passage in a gorgeous canal boat from Buffalo for New York, and the fact was telegraphed by some fifty guns fired at distances from each other of ten or fifteen miles, and in one hour and thirty minutes the news was thus signaled from Buffalo to New York, and a keg of water from Lake Erie was solemnly poured out at Sandy Hook into the Atlantic Ocean, typical of the union effected. Since then what tides of wealth have poured down through it! Under its bridges the Western harvests have come to the seaboard, and the clang of its closing gates the other day echoed across the continent. How well can men afford to be scoffed at and unappreciated in their own time, when they work for the coming centuries! The fact is we are all, with sharper or duller spades, digging canals through which shall roll future influences. The world may sneeringly call our work a "ditch," but God and the angels know it is worth something more than derision. What you do now, however insignificant it may seem to you or others, done in the right spirit and for the right end, will last as long as eternity. In 1785, Christopher Colles, an Irishman not long in this country, suggested this great commercial artery, in a pamphlet entitled, "Proposals for the Speedy Settlement of the Western Portion of New York." His name you never read till this moment, and so much of the good you do may not be recognized on earth, but there will be a realm of reward in the great future. The promise is, "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown."

A Common Scene.

ONE of the most tragic places is a pawnbroker's shop. As I gaze into the window, every article there has a history. Elegant furs. Elegant watches. Elegant flutes. Elegant scarfs. People stand with a pleased look gazing at these things; but I look in with a shudder, as though I had seen into a window of hell. Whose elegant watch was that? It was a drunkard's watch! Whose furs? They belonged to a drunkard's wife! Whose flute? Whose shoes? Whose scarf? They belonged to a drunkard's child!

Shine.

HAVE you a joy? Out with it! Set your candle upon the mantelpiece. When in boyhood, in the country, I went to prayer-meetings, and father would take a lantern and go ahead, and we would all follow in the light of that one lantern, not stumbling or losing our way. Let your light so shine before men! Don't sit during prayer-meeting with your head down in your hands as though you had been asleep two weeks. The homeliest part of you is the top of your head. Let your face shine.

PRAYER: And a Great Prayer Test.

PRAYER is as essential to the divine life as breathing is to the natural one. The wicked restrain prayer—hypocrites pretend it—formalists imitate it—the good pray continually and in everything give thanks. They may well do so, when they consider that the poorest day is the "conflux of two eternities; made up from currents issuing from the remotest past, and flowing onward to the remotest future." What is to take place, they know not; yet they are sure that no event may safely be called a trifle; because great events, frequently spring from what appear to be trifling and commonplace circumstances.

When Joseph bade his father "good-by" and went to seek his brothers, he did not think it would be a "good-by" for twenty years. When David left those few sheep in the wilderness and went down to the camp, he did not think he was going towards the throne of Israel. When Saul went to look for his lost asses, he had no idea he would meet a prophet and find a crown. So, no matter how business presses, we cannot afford to do without God all day, and yet we have no right to expect that if we forget him, he will remember us. Are we insured against accident, sickness, death? Alas, we can make no treaty with these inscrutable agents! But we may ask God to do it for us. We go out every morning, not knowing the way we should take, but nothing can deceive or perplex God; therefore what peace! what stillness of soul! what confidence we may feel when we have put the day and all it may bring forth in his Omnipotent Hand!

The encouragements to personal prayer are many. First: We are not restricted to probabilities. If we ask a human friend to help us, we must not exceed his ability. There is no limit to what we may ask of God. Second: We are encouraged to tell all our griefs, and ask aid for every need, by the form of address taught us. It is not to "Jehovah," "The Eternal," "The King of Kings," but to Our Father we are told to pray; and this by the gracious and immutable promise that he will in nowise cast us out. Third: We are not confined to certain times and places. There is no key to God's Council Chamber; it is always open. God is always on the Mercy Seat. The golden sceptre is always stretched out. Fourth: If we are so sorrowful, so ashamed, so sinful, that we can only cast ourselves there and are "dumb before him," then there is an Advocate accredited and welcome, and

The Son adored the Father:
Be merciful, O God!

Finally, prayer is the touchstone of our spiritual life; for either sinning will make us leave off praying, or praying will make us leave off sinning.

If we pray for ourselves, we shall pray for those we love. Family prayer will grow out of personal prayer; and a family without prayer is like a house without a roof. Say that too often it is only a form, still it is a form in the direct line of duty; and we are more likely to meet God and good angels and good thoughts in that line, than in any other. Family prayer is a home duty, but on this broad and sure foundation are built all other duties; and they only walk perfectly before God, who can say: "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord."

Now, there is a prayer test which I venture to bring to all who desire the largest spiritual life. It is John's prayer for his beloved Gaius: "That thou mayest prosper and be in health even as thy soul prospereth." Which of us dare pray with this stipulation? Do we shrink from such a prayer test? Would we be willing that our financial gains should be measured by our spiritual gains—the profit of the office to be measured by the profit of the closet?

How do we pray for our beloved? for our husbands and wives, our sons and daughters? Can we ask God to bless them with this solemn proviso? If not, has our affection touched its perfect form? John thought it well to pray, that his friend's earthly prosperity did not outrun his spiritual prosperity. He even makes the prosperity of the soul the standard of the body's health; and though he wishes "above all things that Gaius may prosper and be in health," it is only in proportion to the prosperity of his soul. The Apostle thought this a safe rule, and it was also the endorsement of that earlier wisdom which declared "the prosperity of fools destroys them."

The prosperity of the soul! This is then the grand measure by which to measure all earthly good. Is it yet far above us? Can we not at least strive to touch it—to lay hold of it—to eventually make it the condition of our every love and hope? For to be willing that both ourselves and those we love should prosper only as our "souls prosper," is to be not far from that condition which has the promise of "all other good things added to it."

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. George C. Needham began evangelistic services on January 11, in the Reformed Church, on the Heights, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Eight prisoners in the Louisville, Ky., jail were baptized on a recent Sunday. The men, one of them a murderer, had been led to Christ through the services held by a Christian Endeavor Society of the city.

Rev. F. B. Meyer, who is coming to New York in February, to hold a series of services, conducted a Saturday afternoon Bible Class in London at the central Young Men's Christian Association. About two hundred young men attend regularly.

An Interdenominational Missionary Campaign in Chicago was commenced on January 13. Sermons on Foreign Missions were preached in the Evangelical churches, and meetings were held on Wednesday, January 13. A great mass meeting was held in the Auditorium on Friday, January 15.

A large circle of friends will regret to learn that the Rev. Justin D. Fulton, D. D., the stalwart champion of Protestantism, is seriously ill. A patch to the daily journals says that he was stricken with paralysis just as he was entering his pulpit, and is now lying helpless at his home at Somerville near Boston, Mass.

Rev. C. H. Yatman's services in Armagh, Ireland, will not soon be forgotten. A letter received in this city, from Armagh, says: "Altogether the mission is held to have been one of the most fruitful held in Armagh for many years, and the city has been stirred by the services as it has a been for a long time."

An earnest attempt is being made by the Belgian Parliament to deal with the gambling craze. A Sunday gambling club on the French frontier has been the first to be dealt with. The Belgian legislators mean to do their work thoroughly, as shown by their introducing a Bill to make gambling in stocks and shares illegal.

A fire which, at first threatened to be serious, broke out in Princeton University on January 11. It was discovered in Edwards Hall, one of the main dormitories of the University, and it had already made considerable progress. The student formed bucket brigades and fought the fire inch until they succeeded in saving the building.

The many friends of the Rev. S. McBride, D. D., formerly pastor of the Central Baptist Church, Brooklyn, will be glad to hear that he has recovered from his long and painful illness, sufficiently to resume pulpit work. Churches need an occasional supply may address him, care of John Humphreys, 297 Myerson St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

A new social settlement is about to be opened in New York. It will be located in west Forty-seventh street, in the Nineteenth Assembly District. It is a poor neighborhood, and the workers will be glad to give of clothing and aid in conducting meetings, concerts, and an employment bureau. It is to be under the auspices of the Society for Improving Condition of the Poor.

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman commenced a series of services on Jan. 10, at Lafayette Ave. Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn. The Hanson Place Baptist and Methodist Churches and the Baptist Temple co-operated. Services were held in each church in turn. Two services were held each day. Similar services were held in Trinity Baptist Church under the charge of Rev. Philip Strong.

A revival is reported from Olney, through God's blessing on the preaching of Evangelist Williams, of Peoria, Ill., who, assisted by a singer, began a series of meetings that continue two weeks. Six churches united in the meetings: Methodist, Congregational, Baptist, Lutheran, Presbyterian and Evangelical. Each church received additions to its membership.

The loss of the missionary steamer Spring, which was built chiefly through the efforts of the venerable missionary, Dr. Paton, of New Hebrides, is a severe loss to the mission. It cost ten thousand dollars, and was insured for two thousand. She was on her fourth trip, had not completed the first year of her life, she was wrecked on a reef on the north of Caledonia. It is a dangerous coast.

Dr. Bevan, formerly of New York, now Melbourne, Australia, has made an innovative church services. After the benediction has pronounced he invites any member of his congregation who has any criticism of his sermon to step on the platform and ask questions or dispute the sermon. The privilege is appreciated and it takes advantage of it.

Mr. and Mrs. Ira D. Sankey expect to sail New York on Feb. 1st, for a trip through South California and as far north as Portland, Ore. They expect to be away about three months. The same trip last year proved beneficial to Mrs. Sankey's health and it is hoped that she will benefit from it this year. The Evangelist needs a rest after the fatiguing labors of the three months.

A remarkable revival is attending Dr. I. Munhall's meetings at Ottawa, Canada. Hundreds of persons of various ages ranging from teen up to sixty made confession of faith at a meeting, and over six hundred persons make request for prayer. The meetings are held in Dominion Methodist Church, but other denominations are co-operating, and all the churches are adding additions.

A church is to be erected at North Attleboro, Mass., shortly, which is to have as a distinctive feature of its creed the belief known as "Conditional Immortality"; that is that none will have a beyond the grave but those who are in Christ at the impenitent will be annihilated. The book says that if this single church grows into a denomination, it will be about the one hundred fifty-seventh now existing in the United States.

Mr. D. L. Moody had an enormous and at Carnegie Music Hall, New York, on Jan. 18, referring to a pending trial in police headquarters. Mr. Moody took occasion to denounce the bent immorality in the upper circles of society declared against their being one law for Fifth and another for Water St., and one code of morality for men and another for women. He pointed out the indecent pictures to be seen on the many fine houses and urged their owners to destroy them as they were debasing to the mind the young and could not be justified on the ground of high art.

THE BIBLE

AND THE NEWSPAPER

Pompeii's Exhumed Street.

SLOWLY as the work of removing the lava and soil under which Pompeii has lain buried for eighteen centuries goes on, progress is being made. The picture on this page represents the latest avenue which has been cleared. Nearly one hundred and fifty years have passed since the discovery was made that underneath the vines and trees and soil lay buried the ancient city which scholars knew by name, but whose very site had been forgotten. It had been a small city of about thirty thousand souls, a city of luxury and wealth, where citizens of Rome had their country villas and lived lives of pleasure. In the year B.C. 63, it was destroyed by an earthquake and its inhabitants fled from it in terror; but one hundred and forty years later it was again flourishing, had its miniature Senate, its municipal government, its restored temples, theatres and homes.

When came its final catastrophe. On Nov. 23, A.D. 79, while the city was enjoying one of its periodical festivals, the cry was raised that Vesuvius, the volcano which reared its head above the city, and was supposed to be extinct, was on fire. The people fled from the Amphitheatre in consternation. Gladiators were fighting there for the amusement of the spectators and men were dying at the behest of high-born men and women who, by turning the thumb downward, signalled to the victor in the duel that he was to finish his rostrate antagonist. But with the faint mountain belching forth fire, no one could stay to watch the fights. The people poured forth in wild terror and ran through the narrow streets. Those who thought only of their own lives hurried to the gates of the city and escaped; but those who went to their homes to save loved ones or their treasures, perished. There was a throbbing at the mountain, and then millions of light stones white hot, were emitted sky-ward and fell on the city like a hail-storm of fire. Wherever they fell on buildings, flames burst forth and everything that could burn easily was being consumed. Then, all night long and for days afterward, fell the dense deluge of ashes, burying everything in a snow-drift, in their stifling all. They fell so thickly that they buried people in the streets and soon rose above the tops of the highest buildings. Men, women, and children fell beneath them in their flight, or remaining in their homes, were imprisoned or suffocated, or died slowly of hunger. More than a thousand bodies have been found in the course of the excavations. Some had money or jewels in their hands. The ashes have preserved everything, so that after eighteen hundred years, it is possible to get a vivid idea of the life of the city. Inscriptions on the walls, articles in the stores, the very loaves in the baker's oven, are all intact and, every day, some relic is found of the busy life thus suddenly topped. Relics are found, too, which prove that many of the people of Pompeii were at the time of the catastrophe, conscious of the uncleanness and immorality of their lives. A recent exposure in New York, shows that there are people of wealth and education among us now, leading just such lives, heedless of the laws of God and, like the people of Pompeii, ignoring the fact that God has given terrible proof of his abhorrence of such sins.

Turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes, condemning them with an overthrow; having made them an example unto those who afterward should live ungodly. (11. Peter 2:6)

Trouble in the Prisons.

Warden Sage, of the prison at Sing Sing, N. Y., is having an anxious time over the effects of the constitutional amendment which has practically stopped all work in the various penal institutions of New York State. In an interview with a reporter of the Sun, he said that if some means of giving the convicts work is not speedily found, the fate of some of them will be awful. Although the new system has been in operation only a few days, the effects are plainly visible. The men are becoming sullen and unmanageable. They are now locked up in their cells, with nothing to do, for eighteen hours out of the twenty-four, and are thus obliged to endure the solitary confinement that they dread. Formerly the prison was a hive of industry. The convicts were employed in making clothing, carpets, brushes, shoes, plumbers' supplies and other articles, and the occupations made the time pass quickly, and kept the men from brooding and plotting. Many of the men would be quite willing to loaf if they could loaf in their own way, but with prison discipline the monotony of their life is unendurable. The Warden is afraid that some of the men will lose their reason, and that some will certain formalities in his marriage, by which he gives up his citizenship in the United States and assumes the position of an Indian. The murderers of this man contended after their conviction, that he was an Indian to all intents and purposes, and therefore they could not be tried in a Federal Court for his murder. The trial judge held that, as there was no evidence of his having complied with the formalities required by the Cherokees, he was at the time of his murder a citizen of the United States and his murderers were consequently within the jurisdiction of the Federal Court. Judge Brewer, however, who rendered the decision of the Supreme Court, reversed this ruling, and pronounced the man a Cherokee citizen by virtue of the marriage arrangements of the tribe, which he had understood and accepted. The decision is important, because it settles the status of a large number of men who have married Indian wives, and were interested in having the question of their citizenship left open. They neglected to comply with the formalities of Cherokee marriage in the hope that they might claim United States citizenship when there were any rights and privileges to be gained by it; and to claim Cherokee citizenship if there should come a division of tribal property. There are many people trying to hold a similar position toward Christ, avoiding an open confession of him before men so that they may be at liberty to live worldly lives, but hoping by a regular at is vested in the King of Norway and Sweden. The Treaty specially designates and provides for the adjustment of the various classes of claims and disputes likely to arise, including pecuniary claims, territorial claims, fishing claims, boundary disputes, and the rights of protected states. The less important questions are to be decided by a Board of two Arbitrators, with the aid of an umpire, and the graver questions affecting larger interests by a Board of five Arbitrators, two to be appointed by each nation and the fifth to act as umpire—the latter to be chosen by the others, and no one of the five being a member of the first or smaller Board, whose decisions it may have to review. Boundary disputes are to be submitted to a Board of six judges—three British and three American. Provision is made for final selection of an umpire in the event of the death of the King of Norway, and also for equal sharing of all expenses incurred in the proceedings by the two governments. The treaty is to remain in force five years from the date of its ratification by the two governments, which will take place within six months. It now goes to Congress, where it will doubtless be approved. This great triumph of Peace, coming auspiciously on the threshold of the Twentieth Century, will be hailed with gladness by the Christian world. If the European Powers were to follow the example of England and America, the two great Bible-loving nations, a splendid impetus would be given to the coming of that Kingdom for which the world waits. But whether it has this beneficent result or not, it is gratifying to know that as to the two nations concerned, the words of the prophet will be fulfilled:

The counsel of peace shall be between them both. (Zech. 6:13)

The Clue on the Dog.

A New York family owed the quick recovery of a lost child recently to a clue furnished by an inscription on a dog's collar. A policeman in the upper district of New York City saw the boy, who was about five years old, wandering about the streets, dragging a sled after him, and attended by a young Newfoundland dog. The policeman watched him for some time, and noticing the child's aimless manner, asked him where he lived. The boy admitted that he did not know. "Rex and I are losted," he said; "we have been losted all day; we can't find our way." The policeman took him to the station, where the sergeant vainly tried to elicit some information from him. The boy was quite sure that he was very tired, but beyond that fact he did not seem able to explain anything about himself. They put him in the captain's private room and made him comfortable. The dog followed him, against all rules, but with a manifest intention of making trouble if he were prevented. All the policemen took a look at the little wanderer, to see if they could recognize him. This they might do, but when one of them put out his hand to raise the curls from the sleeping child's forehead, the dog showed his teeth and uttered a savage growl. It seemed as if the wanderer would have to stay in the station all night, but one of the policemen bethought himself of looking at the dog's collar. It bore the number of his license, and with that clue it was easy to ascertain his owner's address. A man was sent to the owner, who lived over two miles off. His home was in a turmoil; the child had been missed, and the parents were almost distracted. The father lost no time in going to the station and carrying away his beloved child, the dog running on ahead and barking joyously. It was well that the boy had been in such company. The animal could not keep him from wandering, but it did its best to protect him, and it unconsciously furnished the clue which led to his restoration to his home. Unhappily, when a child of larger growth wanders away from his heavenly Father, it too often happens that he is with companions who render him no such service. They do not protect him, and no one would suppose, from their behavior, that their companion was a child of God.

Whoso keepeth the law is a wise son; but he that is a companion of riotous men shameth his father. (Prov. 28:7) be made so desperate that they will do anything to escape from the prison. He intends to make the most of the occupation which the amendment permits,—that of the manufacture or preparation of articles for use in State institutions. Under this head the stone may be quarried and dressed for new flagging the corridors of the prison, and possibly some of the older buildings may be torn down and rebuilt. This will find work for some of the prisoners, but others who are not fit for stone-work will suffer severely until suitable occupations can be found for them. It is significant that in this, as in so many other things, the way that God appointed for man should prove to be a necessity of his being. Although idleness doubtless brought many of the men into the prison, they crave work now, though it bring them no profit, for the sake of the pleasure it gives. They find by experience that the warning of God's word is true:

The way of the slothful man is as a hedge of thorns. (Prov. 15:19)

Citizens by Marriage.

An important decision of the United States Supreme Court is reported by the Washington Post. The question carried to the tribunal was whether a certain man, who had been murdered, was a citizen of the United States, or belonged to the Cherokee nation. He was a white man who had married a Cherokee wife. It appears that the Cherokees in such cases will admit the man to their tribe, if he observes tendence at church and association with the Lord's people to share heaven with them at the last. Such efforts Christ foresaw would be made by time-servers and he declared that they would fail.

Then shall ye begin to say: We did eat and drink in thy presence, and thou didst teach in our streets; and he shall say, I tell you I know not whence ye are: depart from me. (Luke 13:26)

A Triumph of Peace.

No more important event in American history has taken place in a generation than the signing of the Arbitration Treaty between our government and that of Great Britain. Under that Treaty, to which Secretary of State Olney and Sir Julian Pauncefote, the British Ambassador, attached their signatures in duplicate on Monday, January 11, war between the two great English-speaking, Christian countries becomes a virtual impossibility, since it makes ample provision for the settlement by arbitration of all questions or disputes that may arise. So broad is the scope of the Treaty, that it covers every possible contingency. It provides for the appointment of Arbitrators from high judicial tribunals of the two nations, who shall have the right to select an umpire, and in the event of their failing to select, then such umpire to be appointed by agreement between the U. S. Supreme Court and the British Privy Council. Should these two august bodies fail to appoint, the power of naming an umpire

Questions and Answers.

W. P. T., Billings, Mont. The members of the Christian Endeavor Society of this place had quite a discussion about legal holidays. I write to ascertain if there are any legal holidays in the United States. Also state legal national holidays.

The regular legal holidays are New Year's Day, Washington's Birthday, Fourth of July, Christmas, Labor Day, General Election Day, Decoration Day, and Thanksgiving. These are not statutory holidays, but are observed as legal holidays in nearly all the States. There are local holiday celebrations of various characters in different parts of the country which may be legal, as far as particular sections are concerned, but have no relation to the whole.

Mrs. Amelia E. Barr, replying to a letter commenting on a recent article from her pen, which appeared in a recent issue of this journal, says:

Your correspondent writes that "A. E. Barr has not read the Bible much, when she says, it was the men of the Bible and not the women who saw visions and dreamed dreams." I do not move a hair's breadth from the position I took in the "Dream life of the Bible." It was the men and not the women who were so favored. Your correspondent instances Sarah, Hagar, Manoah's wife, and the Virgin Mary. None of these ever dreamed a dream or saw a vision that is recorded. It was the angel of the Lord who appeared to Abraham and rebuked Sarah; and an angel is a celestial person. It was the angel of the Lord who called to Hagar out of Heaven, (Genesis 21:17.) It was the angel of the Lord that appeared to Manoah's wife and spoke to her. (Judges 13:3.) Certainly, it was an angel—a celestial person—who appeared to Mary and spoke to her, and he is even called by his name, Gabriel. Now angels are persons, and they spoke to the people they visited. Visions are merely events, shadowy presentations of what is to come. Ezekiel, Daniel, Amos, Obadiah, Zechariah, and St. John had splendid visions or revelations. St. Paul also, when he had the vision of the Seventh Heaven, and did not know "whether he was in the body or out of the body." But no such visions as came to the old prophets, ever came to a woman in the world of the Bible, nor is any woman mentioned there as instructed by a dream, except Pilate's wife. Even when it was necessary to carry Jesus into Egypt in order to preserve the young child's life, the dream of warning was sent to Joseph, and not to Mary. Also when the revelation of the birth of John the Baptist was made, it was made to his father and not to his mother.

In addition to the instances cited of angels appearing to women, there is the appearance of the comforting angels at the tomb of Christ. (Luke 24:5.) Beyond these facts I do not remember any other visitation of angels to women, nor is any dream sent to woman recorded, except the one given to Pilate's wife. I trust your correspondent does not really believe "Amelia E. Barr has not read her Bible much," for if there is any book she does know from cover to cover, it is the Bible. AMELIA E. BARR.

J. H. R., Philadelphia, Pa. Who was Aaron Burr and what was the cause of his downfall?

He was the third Vice-President of the United States in 1800. Briefly stated, misdirected ambition caused his ruin. Read the remarkable story of his life in any volume of American biographies.

C. Jewett, Worcester, Mass. What is the date of the building of the City of Rome, and how did it come about that A. U. C. should stand for that year?

The date of the foundation of Rome is variously placed by half a dozen authorities. Fabius Pictor gives it as 747 B. C.; Polybius 750 B. C.; Cato 751 B. C.; Placens 752 B. C.; and Terentius Varro 753 B. C. Cicero and Pliny agree with Varro, and Livy with Cato. Modern chronologists have generally adopted Varro. The letters "A. U. C." represent the phrase ab urbe condita (meaning "from the building of the city").

J. F. Rawson, Pittsburgh, Pa. I have visited the Bowery Mission, eaten at its restaurant and moved among the men who gather there, and I know of no charity that is doing anything like the work which the Lord enables you to do in the Bowery Mission. I have been a contributor to the Mission for many years. I have not, until lately, had such an opportunity of becoming acquainted with its actual work, which I find far exceeds, in breadth and Christ-like character, anything you have described in your paper. It is my desire that, even after my death, my interest in the work should continue, and I have therefore remembered the Bowery Mission in my will. I trust that this example may stimulate others to do likewise, as I consider that a work of this character is deserving of the support of the Lord's people everywhere. Would that we had a thousand Bowery Missions, scattered throughout the length and breadth of our country, which would thereby be immeasurably the gain.

We thank our correspondent for his appreciation of the work done at the Bowery Mission, and we feel sure that his sentiments are already shared by very many readers of this journal, who take a deep interest in the spiritual activities of a rescue movement of this character. We welcome all the co-operation that comes from such a source, as it enables the Mission's work to expand and be still more effective than it has been during the eighteen years of its existence.

D. G. M., Tracy, Cal. I have a violent temper, and am easily angered. When excited I become quite reckless of what I say. I am always sorry for these outbursts of temper. Do you think I pray as much as I ought against this evil? Please give in detail what you consider good advice in reference to the matter.

If, when you are tempted to such outbursts, you try to remember how Christ was insulted, outraged, spat upon, smitten, bruised, reviled and belied, and how meekly and calmly he bore himself under it all, you may be brought to appreciate the comparative triviality of the causes of your own anger. Just reflect an instant when provoked, and ask yourself "What would He have done?" A moment's deliberation will wonderfully help to clear away the tempest. Besides this, pray unceasingly that you may overcome the habit of passion, and you will be strengthened for the trial.

Another native Armenian pastor in Turkey, (the faithful spiritual shepherd of a Protestant flock in Erzeroum province), writes us that his copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for which he is a subscriber, has been seized by the Turkish government for six months in succession. This is another illustration of the petty tyranny exercised by the Sultan's postal officials to prevent THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from reaching the hands of its regular readers

U. S. TORPEDO BOAT, CUSHING, IN NEW YORK BAY.

One of the weakest points in our otherwise admirable Navy—attention to which has been recently directed since the controversy over Cuban affairs—is the torpedo service. The Cushing (shown in the photograph), presents the best type of the American torpedo boat. These small vessels, having great speed and availability for quick service, are important factors in naval service. Spain has some 20 torpedo boats in all, with a speed varying from 19 to 24 knots an hour. Our Navy, under pressure, could put in commission about eight torpedo boats, averaging a slightly larger tonnage and higher speed than those of Spain. Present probabilities point to a large increase in the number of these boats for the United States Navy in the near future.

in Moslem territory. The pastor in question writes:

It has been good reading, particularly for me. I am very much pleased with its spirited and helpful sermons. Sometimes they have been translated into the Armenian language, which has been very helpful to our people. You cannot know how far the blessed influence of your paper is extended.

Inquirer, Lowell, Mass. Is it wrong for a church to lease its former building for a theatre?

It is, decidedly. If the control of the building remains in the hands of the Trustees, they are responsible for the purpose to which it may be devoted, and such a course as you mention would be inconsistent with their Christian profession.

Perplexity, Deer Isle, Me. 1. Is it the duty of a Christian to ask a "silent blessing" at the table of unconverted people, or of professed Christians, fellow church members, who do not crave a blessing at table? 2. Would it be best to begin now at the house of old friends where one has visited for years and has never done so?

1. In such a case, if you are a guest among friends, you can give no offence whatever by saying that you have been accustomed to ask a blessing and, if they are agreeable, it may be asked amiably—just a simple petition of a few words. On the other hand, if among strangers, ask a silent blessing. 2. By all means. The fact that you have never done so makes it all the more imperative to do it now.

Miss J. D. B., Gibson City, Ills. 1. Is it wrong to wear jewelry? 2. What kind of meat should be eaten by those who mean to live right?

1. The wearing of jewelry is a custom sanctioned by immemorial usage, but if indulged in all, it should be worn with great moderation. Really earnest Christians, with a high purpose in living, will never give it a thought, since it will seem to be too vain and frivolous to waste time upon. There is nothing more offensive or vulgar than an overdressed and bejewelled person, flashy with gold and diamonds. Yet there are few so strict as to find fault with the wearing of some modest souvenir of some dear friend, or perhaps a loving gift from another. It is all a matter of taste, but the less worn the better, and none is best of all. 2. The Jews and many other nations have indicated by law what animals should not be eaten, and the tendency among civilized peoples is in the direction of a more limited meat diet. Modern dietetic authorities assure us that our food is reflected in our character, and that "gross feeding tends to gross living." This being so, one should regulate his diet accordingly, and with due regard to mental and physical condition and habits.

Constant Reader, Sinnickson, Va. 1. Is it right to play sentimental songs, such as "Anne Laurie," during the marriage ceremony; also, "The Bridal March," in church? 2. Is there a book published explaining all the different church doctrines?

1. It would unquestionably be in poor taste and out of place to play such tunes (as the one you first mention) at such a time; yet we can readily understand that a recognizable strain from a secular tune might form part of an organ "voluntary" or prelude. "The Bridal March" is the proper tune to play on such occasions. 2. Almost any good encyclopedia will give an outline. For fuller details, see McLintock & Strong's Biblical Encyclopedia.

Student, New Haven, Conn. Is there any way of fixing approximately the date of any important event in early Hebrew history, so that we might get some idea of other events?

An ingenious attempt to fix the date of the Exodus has recently been made by Dr. Edward Mahler, a learned professor of Vienna. He boldly asserts that the passage of the Red Sea took place March 27, 1335 B. C. That it took place in March or early in April of some year, of course, we know, by the reckoning of the Passover celebration, which corresponds with Easter. Prof. Mahler's decision as to the year evidences of the foresight and goodness of God even in pain. One of them is that singular provision in excessive suffering which we call "fainting." It is like the safety valve of a steam engine, operated by the very power that brings danger. When pain becomes so extreme that nature cannot bear it, the man faints, that is, becomes unconscious of what he is suffering. That is a very merciful provision indicating the kindness and foresight of the Creator.

Mrs. G. M. Alleghany, Pa. Can I obtain the 1897 Library without renewing so far in advance, a subscription having some nine and a half months to run?

Yes, on sending $2 to this office you will receive the 1897 Premium Library.

W. L. T., Elizabeth, Colo. Would it be wrong if a sincere Christian man who has not been ordained, were to administer the bread and wine at a sacrament if no clergyman duly qualified has visited the section where a number of Christians live for some time, or is likely to visit it?

We suppose our Episcopal and Presbyterian friends would be horrified at the idea of his so doing. You must, therefore, take our personal opinion for what you consider it worth. We think that if the Christian people of a section desire to sit at the Lord's table and celebrate the supper as he instituted it, they are perfectly justified in inviting one of the number to administer it, though he is not ordained, and that he is justified in acceding to their request. We do not believe that ordination makes a man one whit more fit to officiate than he was before. But remember this is only a personal opinion, and the man who acts up to it may bring down upon his head the wrath of the ecclesiastical authorities of his church.

S. E. P., Providence, R. I. How do you reconcile the statement in Ps. 51:16, 17 that God desires not any sacrifice but a broken heart, with a statement in verse to that he will be pleased with sacrifices of bullocks, &c?

Two explanations have been suggested. C is that the last verse formed no portion of the Psalm as it was originally written, but so priest or temple official fearing that the people reading the Psalm might leave off bringing sacrifices, added the verse to keep up the custom and square the Psalm with the popular belief which was profitable to the priest. The other explanation which is more accord with the orthodox views is that the man who has committed a grievous sin and is in the condition described in the beginning of the Psalm is in a state of alienation from God. That God requires no sacrifice from him. He must first render the sacrifice of a broken heart and a contrite spirit. Then when he has thus put himself in the right attitude toward God, his sacrifice of bullocks will be acceptable.

Reader, New York City. In looking at some ancient pictures, I noticed that nearly all the religious ones have a fish in them as if emblematical. Do you know if it had a meaning?

The frequency of the picture of a fish has often puzzled people. Dr. T. Stokes, in his work on the emblem of the Church, suggests a probable explanation. It is that each of the letters in the Greek word for fish, forms the initial of the name or title in Greek of our Lord. Jesus, Christ, God, Son, Savior. The primitive Christians delighted to symbolize the sacred titles in a way which would not excite the animosity of Pagans, and would be intelligible to the initiated Christians.

Western Ranch Life.

Efficiently Picturesque, but Full of Hardships and Rough Pioneering.

WHAT can a cowboy know of home?" some reader inquires, on observing the legend under the photograph on this page. Yet the cowboy of to-day is much less of a nomad than the man of ten or fifteen years ago. He is still, however, a unique character, at once the terror and amusement of his section: full of fun and practical jokes, rough with strangers, and contemptuous of many of the usages of Eastern civilization; but, all in all, there is much that is good in him. We only take the trouble to search it out. Brave, strong, fearless, and cool in anger, true as steel to friends and highly valorous wherever women are concerned, the dangerous side of his character has been greatly exaggerated by many writers, who have made the eccentricities of a cowboy appear as the character of all.

Life in the cowboy is a life on a ranch, which lacks many of the comforts and conveniences that are to be found even in the plainest of ordinary farm-houses; but it is home, nevertheless, and as such, finds a place in the affections of its rough occupants. Whether of logs, shingles, or clapboards, these dwellings are usually strong enough to withstand the gales that sweep across the plains, and warm enough to afford snug quarters for the men and horses in winter. Superb riding they are, these athletic, brown-skinned fellows, and a horse does not stand that will not know the cowboy's mastery. In those sheds, tucked on either side by stables, is the cowboy's home. At the door are hung or led the trophies of the chase—deer heads with their graceful antlers, big buffalo heads, and perhaps a bearskin or two. Sometimes a young deer is tamed and kept as a pet of the ranch, and it wanders everywhere, from kitchen to stables, at home sweet will. The cowboy is his own cook, and none knows better how to make a fresh meat, or even dried buffalo is generally a luxury not to be had, and provisions from the nearest town trading station are used instead. Experience has taught the cowboy to supply his own larder, and do his own cooking, mending, and in the absence of willing hands to do these things for him, it is not surprising that, with all its drawbacks, the ranchman's cabin should like a home to him. Lying out there, on a lonely stretch of plain, the only building of any kind in sight, he finds a sociable, pleasant place after a hard day's riding.

Royal Betrothal.
Probably no family in the world has made so many royal alliances or sent its members into so many different lands as the ruling family of Denmark. Lately it is announced that Prince Christian Charles, the eldest son of the Danish crown Prince, had been betrothed to Princess Pauline of Wurtemberg. The King and Queen of Denmark have had a large family of children. Their daughter Alexandra was married to the Prince of Wales in 1863. Last July their grandson, Prince Charles, was wedded to Princess Maud, daughter of the Prince of Wales. Prince Charles is the second son of the Danish Crown Prince, whose eldest son was quite lately betrothed to Princess Pauline of Wurtemberg, the only daughter of King William and his first wife, Princess Marie of Waldeck-Pyrmont. Princess Pauline Olga Helene Emma, the newly-betrothed, is nineteen years old, and has hitherto spent a very quiet, uneventful life, chiefly at Stuttgart. Left motherless when five years old, the princess was brought up by her grandmother until her father's second marriage in 1886 gave her a stepmother. The bridegroom-elect, Prince Christian Charles Frederick Albert Alexander William, is a pleasant-looking young fellow of twenty-six, simple and unaffected in his ways, and of very amiable disposition. The young pair are in no sense extraordinary people, and would not hands are beating time together, all voices are intoning the same degree, all minds are focussed upon the same tone or symbol at the same instant, and all souls are influenced by the same inspiring melody."

Some Pleasures of Old Age.

As a general thing, when people grow old, they lament that many sources of enjoyment which are open to the young, are closed to the aged. But may not others be placed in their stead? Something may be done in this behalf by cultivating the right feelings and habits, during the course of life. Of great importance is that quick and genial sympathy which enables one to enter readily into the feelings of others, and share them. This disposition gives to some aged people a most delightful capacity to enjoy the society of youth, and to take delight in witnessing and sharing innocent sports of children.

When, together with this, there is a contented spirit, a habit of cheerfully enjoying what Providence bestows, without any repining for what Providence withholds; and a power of directing the mind to elevated contemplations—then you behold as pleasant a picture of peace and happiness as can anywhere be found.

The Mothers' Congress.

In our issue of Dec. 23 last, it was announced that a Congress of Mothers would be held in Washington, Feb. 17-19. At that time, the names of a number of prominent ladies were given as prospective par-

THE DREAM-COUNTRY.

WHERE is the river that silently glides And touches the country of Day? And where is the boat that gives wonderful To little ones tired of their play? [rides And who is the rower that skims o'er the deep With a musical dip of the oar? And where is the beautiful Harbor of Sleep? And where is the Lullaby Shore?

O queer are the ways of the people who dwell On the heights of that country so grand, And strange are the tales that our darlings can tell When they come from that mystical land, They tell us of giants and fairies and elves Who do just whatever they please— Who sometimes are pleasant and good, like themselves, And sometimes they quarrel and tease.

The Night is the wonderful river that flows, And touches the country of Day, And mamma, the wonderful rower who rows To the dream-land away and away. The boat-man must sing you a beautiful song Till we come to that country so fair— So rock-a-by darling—we're speeding away, And our boat is the rock-a-by chair. Vineland, N. J. —CARRIE ELLIS BRECK.

The New Home.

THERE is nothing but the old-fashioned religion that will take a woman through the trials of home life. At first there may be a romance or a novelty that will do for a substitute. The marriage-hour has just passed, and the perplexities of the household are more than atoned by the joy of being together, and by the fact that when it is late they do not have to discuss the question as to whether it is time to go! The mishaps of the household, instead of being a matter of anxiety and reprehension, are a matter of merriment—the loaf of bread turned into a geological specimen; the slushy custards; the jaundiced or measly biscuits. It is a very bright sunlight that falls on the cutlery and the mantel ornaments of a new home. But after a while the romance is all gone, and then there is something to be prepared for the table that the book called "Cookery Taught in Twelve Lessons" will not teach. The recipe for making it is not a handful of this, a cup of that, and a spoonful of something else. It is not something sweetened with ordinary condiments, or flavored with ordinary flavors, or baked in ordinary ovens. It is the loaf of domestic happiness, and all the ingredients come down from heaven, and the fruits are plucked from the Tree of Life, and it is sweetened with the new wine of the kingdom, and it is baked in the oven of home trial. Solomon wrote out of his own experience. He had a wretched home. A man cannot be happy with two wives, much less six hundred; and he says, writing out of his own experience: "Better is a dinner of herbs where love is than a stalled ox and hatred therewith."

About "Calling Cards."

It is always well to be informed as to the proper methods of performing everyday social obligations. Calling cards vary little in a general way from year to year, though each season some slight changes in their style may be noted. Last year the thin, flexible card was in use, but there is a general return this year to heavier, more elegant cards of decided firmness. The obvious reason for the adoption of the thin card was its convenience when a number had to be carried in the card case. The sizes of calling cards remain about the same. The correct size for a married lady's visiting card is 3 11-16x2 5-16. For an unmarried lady the size is 3 13-16x2 15-32 and for a girl's calling cards 3x2. For gentlemen the universal size is 2 15-16x1 7-16. Heavy script is still the prevailing style of lettering used upon calling cards.

attract so much attention were it not for the fact that their betrothal is another link in the long chain of relationship which little Denmark has cast over nearly all Europe, and which is no inconsiderable aid in maintaining European peace.

Children's Joy in Singing.

On several occasions, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has advocated home singing and class singing as one of the highest of youthful enjoyments. On this subject The Teacher has the following interesting remarks: "Instruction in 'rote singing' or song singing, and in singing by note, is one of the most pleasant as it is one of the most profitable of the teacher's duties, or privileges rather, and so becomes an important educational factor. Music is as sunshine and fresh air and rest to the tired pupil. After a song-recess bright eyes and beaming faces attest its exhilarating effects. Refreshed by music, the mind is again ready to attempt and to grasp that which to the weary child had become unattractive and, therefore, difficult. It makes children happy; it inspires them to renewed and continued effort; it modulates and cultivates their voices; it conduces to health; it fills their souls with refining emotions; it places mind and body 'en rapport.' Music has, too, a valuable disciplinary effect that must not be overlooked. At a given signal a class or an entire school is engaged in the same exercise, requiring the utmost precision in its execution. All participants in the proceedings of the Congress, including Mrs. Adlai Stephenson, Mrs. William L. Wilson, Miss Morton, Mrs. Phebe Hearst, Mrs. H. W. Fuller, Mrs. A. A. Birney, Mrs. T. W. Birney, Mrs. Kincaid, and Mrs. Jannet Richards. It is now announced that the following will be among the speakers: Mrs. Bainbridge of New York, on "Mothers of the Submerged Class;" Mrs. Carter of North Carolina, on "Mothers among the Mountain Whites;" Mr. Hamilton Cushing, on "Mother and Child in Primitive Life;" Anthony Comstock, on "How to Guard the Young against Bad Literature;" Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster, on "Reading Courses for Mothers;" Hamilton Mabie, on "How to Interest the Young in the Great Literature of the World." It is hoped that this unique convention may be able to accomplish some results that will prove valuable to American mothers, and its proceedings will everywhere be regarded with interest.

Over the Cradle.

I bent me over the cradle-bed And tenderly stroked the sunny head, And pressed a kiss on the velvet brow. As I said: "You are only baby now; But when you have to a woman grown, And your baby prattle and smiles have flown, May you strive to do what you think is best, And God, my darling, will do the rest. May your life be perfect, your soul be pure, And taught to evil your steps allure. May your heart be bright as a sparkling gem, Is my only prayer, sweet Miriam." And baby, as if she could understand, Thrust into my own her tiny hand.

A STRANGE DINNER PARTY.

BY

AMELIA E. BARR.

"HEN," said Mr. Moran, replying to John's remark, "it is a kind of calamity to be rich, if to riches is attached a constant care of the poor. Who wants such a disagreeable responsibility?"

"Nevertheless," answered John, "the rich man is responsible, always, and absolutely. There is no such thing as irresponsible riches. They may be buried in real estate, or in bonds, or hidden away in the vaults of the Chemical Bank; but their owner will have to render an account of their usage, even to the uttermost farthing; and that to One who cannot be imposed upon."

"So! So!" cried Max Lehman. "This is very good. If this be your Christian Socialism, I like it! I had no hope that you were so wide-awake, and so sympathetic."

"The poor never had a greater friend than Christ; and there are few men more wide-awake to existing conditions, than the Christian clergy of the present day."

"I cannot believe that," replied Lehman scornfully.

"You must believe their own declarations. The Bishop of Winchester predicts a tornado, generated by the 'zones of enormous wealth and degrading poverty.' Cardinal Manning declares that 'the world of capital is combining in alarm, against the world of labor.' Cardinal Gibbons warns us 'of a struggle, the signs of which fill us with disquiet: because the thirst for wealth is daily more insatiable; and the cries of the distressed, more poignant and violent.' 'Lazarus,' says the Rev. Mr. Hughes, 'is no longer lying on the doorsteps of Dives, in the quiescence of sullen despair; he is vehemently gesticulating to hungry men at the corners of the streets.' Bishop Berry says 'the working classes are now demanding that Christianity should be tried by its power to serve the welfare—physical, intellectual, and moral—of the great mass of men;' and the Bishop of Derry says 'what there is in the Gospel to rectify the relations of human life, to elevate the selfishness of capital, and chasten the selfishness of labor, that will find eager listeners. But to the men of the near future, religion will appear a barren and worthless thing, unless it bear the fruits of human love.'"

Lehman looked irresolutely at the two ladies. He wished to launch out his most extreme opinions on religion and social limitations; but was restrained by the saintly, introspective face of Mrs. Lloyd; and equally so, by the sympathy in the girlish countenance of Alice. It was a relief to him, when Mrs. Lloyd stood up and said to John, "Sir, I am glad to have heard you. If I have been a careless steward hitherto, I will err no more." Then Alice rose, and John rose also, and opening the door he stood by it, until the ladies had passed out of the room. It was a wonderful experience to him. The sway and movement of Alice's gown deliciously troubled his senses; and her sweet, shy glance of recognition for service, went to his heart like wine.

Lehman attacked him vehemently as soon as the restraining influence of the ladies was removed. Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Moran patiently encouraged his diatribe; they wished to hear what extremes his class held in reserve; and were not astonished to learn, that if Communism was not possible, they were quite willing to try "barricades and bayonets." Yet even to these two men, who had practically made gold their God, there was something terrible in the whole, the abrogation of every divine claim, and social restriction; and they were glad to hear John's impetuous, earnest denial of all Lehman's assertions.

"You are blindly mistaken, Max Lehman," he said. "There is no nation on the earth willing to be without God and without His worship. Will men indeed, ever give up their idea of Home, and purity, and their belief in all goodness? Will men ever cease to love their men ever cease to love their parents, and their wives and children, and to respect all good women? No! No! No! A thousand times, No!"

As John uttered these words, Mr. Moran took out his watch, and with a sombre, hurried manner said he "must hurry away, in order to get a train;" and Lehman also remembered that he "had an engagement." Then Mr. Lloyd said he would drive both gentlemen to the station; and John proposed to accompany them; but this his host would not permit.

"I wish you very much to remain," he said. "I have some particular business to talk over with you. I dare say you will find Mrs. and Miss Lloyd in the next room, and they will be pleased with your company for an hour, I know."

The sound of a piano very softly played led him to the apartment. Alice was alone with her dreamy, inconsequent music, and she stopped suddenly at John's entrance. Then they fell naturally into a conversation about Jessie, and the musical world in general, illustrating the opinions and likings by a verse or a few bars from the song or piece in discussion. Nothing puts two strangers so readily and so surely at ease as music, and there was indeed a most entrancing and dangerous power, in the small courtesies and guarded familiarities of the position in which John and Alice found themselves. Their hands frequently touched on the ivory keys; when John bent forward to scan or to turn an unknown page, he could not escape the sense of delicious nearness, and in the blending of their voices they were conscious of a still more subtle and delightful consonance.

Finally, as Alice was looking through a musical folio for a song she wanted, John asked, "What melody were you playing as I entered? It was full of sadness; then why were you playing it? For it really sounded as if it was an interpretation."

"I do not know what it was. I was simply playing an accompaniment to my thoughts. And as they were on the subject you had been talking of during the dinner hour, is there any wonder if they were sad? I should think if Socialism has any music it must be of the most melancholy kind."

"Oh, no!" he answered, with a radiant face. "Christian Socialism has divined its triumph and is already singing of it. If you will permit me, I can let you hear how it sings."

Then Alice gave place with a smile that set John's heart singing, and he struck the keys in a few masterful chords. And nothing is more remarkable than the way in which men acquire music. Women spend years in its study and practice and achieve but small results; men never take regular lessons but "pick up" the knowledge at odd hours, and yet in some occult way attain a skill that is instantly recognized.

As soon as John evoked those few distinct, forcible unisons, Alice knew he could make her piano say whatever he wished it to say. Then his voice joined the rhythmical march of melody, and William Morris's famous inquiry was in her ears—

What is this dread sound and rumor? What is this that all men hear?
Like the wind in hollow valleys, when the storm is drawing near,
Like the rolling of the ocean, in the eventide of fear?
'Tis the people marching on!

Hark! the roll of the thunder,
Lo the sun, and lo the under,
Riseth wrath, and hope, and wonder,
And the host comes marching on!

The words went in swinging, ringing phrases to the grand, magnetic, prophetic music of "John Brown" and the enthusiasm with which they were sung kindled in Alice a like warmth of feeling. Unconsciously she leaned towards the singer, just as the sunflower sways to the sun.

They had forgotten time and place and social circumstances; they were but two young, sympathetic hearts, full of the same noble regrets and hopes for humanity, and as yet not aware that their love and pity for all suffering and oppressed had found a personal interpretation of its unselfish sweetness in their own mutual regard.

Only for a few minutes were they permitted this immortal experience. As John finished the first verse, Mr. Lloyd opened the door of the parlor and there was an instantaneous chill and change. John struck the last chord into discord, and rose with a slight embarrassment, for Mr. Lloyd's face was dark with disapproval and he said sharply:

"I must answer this question to my Maker."

"That is a good song for a Labor Meeting, but hardly for a girl's parlor. Alice, your mother wishes to see you. You need not return for Mr. McAslin and I have now some business to arrange."

She went away depressed and saddened. A few moments previously she would have given John her hand and a kind "good night" but her father's words and manner had taken all light and confidence out of her heart. She bowed slightly and with a sense of wrong went slowly upstairs. Her mother had not wished to see her. That message was a fabrication to secure her absence. Why had her father thought it necessary? Had her face, her manner, or her voice betrayed more interest than he approved?

Mrs. Lloyd expressed no surprise and asked no questions. She was not, according to her usual custom, seated before her window looking out into space and lost in reveries of mystical devotion. She was walking restlessly about the room, with her hands dropped and clasped in front.

Her face had lost its quiescent look, the placid pool of her soul had at last been troubled.

"If it is all true, Alice!" she said, in a voice low and tremulous with emotion. "It is all true, what shall we do to be saved? I cannot sleep. I dare not sleep. I have tried to keep in the Way of Holiness, and not to let the sight or even the thought of sin come near my soul. And what if this should be the Way of Selfishness? You must leave me to-night. I have to answer this question to my Maker, and I do not know how I am to answer it," and she suddenly covered her face with her hands in an abandon of contrition.

Alice was not sorry to be dismissed. The questioning and anxiety of an awakened conscience were not at that hour interesting. Her own heart was tossed and-fro, and tumultuously demanding consideration. She went to her room without a word of protest and for a few minutes sat there motionless. Then she rose and locked the door. She wanted some tangible evidence that she was alone with the great problem, it was now imperatively necessary for her to settle, and that once. Its consideration drew her brows together and set her mouth firm and tight, as she went about disrobing. Not a muscle of her face moved, not a smile brightened its sombre air of perplexed thought, as she folded away her gown and then uncoiled her brown hair. Many times during this occupation her mind and feelings dominated her so entirely that her hands ceased their duty and fell listlessly to her knees. For awhile there would be an utter unconsciousness of this action then suddenly she would force herself to resume her toilet, only once more to fall into an idle reverie. And yet evidently, during the semi-lapse of physical consciousness, she was in a state of abnormal mental activity. In fact, she was probing her heart that night as severely and truthfully as her mother was probing her conscience.

In about half-an-hour it had come to a question of argument and she talked back to herself with a constantly increasing sense of right, and a constantly increasing determination to do right. The her actions became more rapid and alert and her face more expressive. She abruptly ceased brushing her hair and pinned it quickly into its usual night coil. All her other preparations for sleep were promptly accomplished, and she finally turned the key of her jewel case, and began to drop into it, the sparkling rings shone upon her fingers. A letter lay, with an almost offensive prominence upon the uppermost velvet cushion. She looked at it fixedly as she let ring after ring fall into their places—then she lifted the crested paper, and tore it with a low decision into many pieces.

The letter was from Lord Medw

We know but little of any event from its mere name. Mr. Lloyd in inviting John McAslin and Max Lehman, as representatives of two distinct methods of the regeneration of Society, called meeting a dinner. But the appellation no way fitted the circumstance, and its suits were very different from what had been intended. Their effect upon Mrs. Lloyd was quickly evident. When she came down to breakfast the following morning even her husband glanced at her with curiosity. She looked as if some one had rudely wakened her from sleep. There was the same startled expression, the same trembling uncertainty, with that for alertness which gradually settles into vigilant attention—the whole attitude making a very marked contrast to her usual straitened manner.

No notice, however, was taken of change during the meal. She asked if McAslin was to eat it with them, and Lloyd answered—"No; he returned to New York by a very early train. I have engaged him as my confidential secretary, and may now, therefore, be frequently in house. I advise both you and Alice talk very little to him, and not to talk all to him on the subject introduced to-night. It is not one for women to inquire into."

Loyalty to Christ.
Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week beginning Jan. 31. John 8: 31; 13: 31-38.

It is well that occasionally the question should be put and honestly answered: What is involved in loyalty to Christ? A popular writer represents one of his characters as complaining that his minister preached too much about mere duty, and disappointed those among his hearers who wanted to hear more doctrine and more about Christ as their Redeemer. There are many members of churches who share his preference. The robe of Christ's righteousness is very much in request to cover ugly blotches and disfigurements of personal character, and those who have no righteousness of their own are comforted by sermons about imputed righteousness. They may be true sermons, too. The doctrine needs to be preached and enforced, but it is not the whole truth. It is, unhappily, necessary to remind those who bear the name of Christ that they must have his spirit, otherwise they are none of his. Neither church-membership nor Christian Endeavor membership will avail to save those who are wilfully living in sin, or are conducting their lives on principles that Christ abhorred. The Apostle Paul went further than this. He declared that a man might give his body to be burned—actually die a martyr's death—and yet be disowned by Christ at the last for failing to live in his spirit. Christ is not to be imposed upon and cannot be deceived. Orthodox beliefs, efforts to save souls, munificent gifts, the endorsement of the church—will all count as nothing if a man is not living the Christian life. It is better that every man who calls himself a Christian should understand this, than that he should deceive himself and cherish a hope that is false. Orthodoxy, liberality and energy in Christ's service are all good, but they will not be accepted as substitutes for righteousness.

It is not difficult to discover what Christ expected of his disciples. He made no concealment of the difficulties of discipleship. He would not lower his standard to admit any one, not even the rich young ruler, whom he loved. No one is forced into discipleship, but neither are volunteers accepted unless they will comply with the conditions. If any one desires to become a disciple, he is encouraged and assured of welcome, but there is only one door. He must submit himself to Christ and follow him. This seems, at first sight, to be much easier now than it was in the early days of Christianity, but it is not so. It is true that the prison and the martyr's death are not now penalties of following Christ, but the spirit of the world and the natural propensities of human nature, which are the most formidable obstructions, have to be overcome still. A man has still to take up his cross when he follows Christ, otherwise he cannot be his disciple. All the ingenuity of worldly Christians has been exercised to find a way of making the best of both worlds, but without avail. He that loveth his life shall lose it. The spirit of Christ is diametrically opposed to the spirit of the world, and he who denies himself worldly pleasures and worldly gains because he is accounted a Christian, denies himself foolishly and to no purpose, unless he cultivates the spirit of Christ. He misses the good things of this world and has no compensation for them. It is absurd to see a man "pushing to the front," as he is exhorted to do, and at the same time professing to be a follower of him who reproved his disciples for their ambition. It is ridiculous to see a man plotting and scheming to advance his own interests to the detriment of some one else and at the same time professing to be loyal to Him who hated selfishness and greed as the worst of faults. It is futile to cherish some sweet sin in the hope that Christ will overlook it and accept service to make up the default. He who hates his brother and defrauds him—nay, who does not love his brother and minister to him will fail of acceptance though he be honored in the church and is accounted a shining light. Loyalty to Christ includes implicit obedience to his commands.

THE LOVE OF CHRIST.
STRANGE matchless love, past all our comprehension.
Deeper and higher than the sea and sky,
Broader than all the boundless space around us,
Stronger than death, long as eternity.
We ne'er can measure with our finite senses,
A grace so infinite. We only know
That with a love surpassing understanding,
Christ watches o'er his children's steps below.
We know he holds us in his tender keeping,
And giveth his beloved rest and sleep.
And daily showers upon the countless blessings.
Gives joy for sadness, calm for eyes that weep.
No place so dark but he can walk beside us,
No path so rough but he can smooth the way,
No cross too heavy that he bids us carry,
No heart so troubled that it cannot pray.
And when beyond all fear and pain forever,
We scan the past illumed with sudden light,
We then shall recognize his loving leading,
And humbly say we have been led aright.
And ever through the calm, long, glorious ages,
We still shall hold this gift of love unpriced,
And ne'er shall find among Heaven's countless wonders,
So great a wonder as the love of Christ.

LILLIAN GREY.

SAFE IN HEAVEN.
NO more of earthly trial.
Safe—safe in heaven.
No need for self-denial,
Safe—safe in heaven.
No more of toil or heart-ache,
Safe—safe in heaven.
No more of want or heart-break,
Safe—safe in heaven.
No burdens, no more crosses,
Safe—safe in heaven.
No sadness, no more losses,
Safe—safe in heaven.
No sickness, no more crying,
Safe—safe in heaven.
No parting, no more dying,
Safe—safe in heaven.
Soul-satisfying sweetness,
Safe—safe in heaven.
All glory and completeness,
Safe—safe in heaven.
Safe through all tribulation,
Safe—safe in heaven.
Singing with jubilation,
Safe—safe in heaven.
CHORUS.
Safe in heaven—safe in heaven
Where no stormy billows roll.
Safe in heaven—safe with Jesus,
Blessed harbor of the soul!

The Closing Dispensation.
Indications in International Complications of the Approaching End of the Times of the Gentiles.

BY REV. J. WILKINSON.

WHATEVER school of interpretation of prophecy we may belong to, there is a general consensus of opinion expressed by all students of revealed dates. We have nothing to do with unrevealed dates. The results of the study ought to be given modestly and suggestively rather than dogmatically; but there is a consensus of opinion that we are within a very short period of the close of the time of the Gentiles, if you reckon 2,520 years of the times of the Gentiles, from 622 B.C., Nebuchadnezzar's accession. I will not suggest how near it is. But did you ever witness in the history of the world a spectacle such as we have had recently of the Great Powers of Europe, with millions of trained men ready for war, with hundreds of millions of money ready to be spent in anything considered a just war; and all these Powers, with modern appliances for human destruction such as were never known before, and all impotent before one rotten Power that could almost be crushed with finger and thumb, and all standing powerless while she is butchering helpless Christians—many of them true Christians—and they can do nothing? Can you explain it? Ah, yes, you can explain it—because it would involve a universal war. And who says so? The Book says so. They do not go to the Book, but they confirm the Book.

There is to be one universal war before the reign of universal peace, and its climax will be in Palestine, and when our Lord returns on Mount Olivet to the Jewish nation, according to the fourteenth chapter of Zechariah, the Church having been taken up before to meet him on the way, he will split Mount Olivet with an earthquake, and he will come to be the accepted of the nation and to crush Antichrist and to hush the warring world to peace. He finds all nations gathered to battle, and just before the opening of the Millennium, as described in the twentieth chapter of the Apocalypse, you have some events described in the nineteenth chapter.

Note three points in that chapter. You have the marriage of the Lamb at the opening of the chapter. That is the Church meeting the Lord in the air. In the middle of the chapter the heaven opens and Christ returns to earth. And at the close of the chapter, just before you enter upon the Millennial era in the twentieth chapter, you have a great war raging. You have that all through the Scriptures—one universal war before the reign of universal peace. And why does it not all come immediately now? Why is Turkey allowed to go on? I will tell you what I believe from analogy. Why did not the Jews go direct from Egypt to Palestine? "Well," you say, "they were disobedient, and had to wander about in the wilderness in consequence of their disobedience." Was that the only reason? Think again. God said, "The iniquity of the Amorite is not yet full." So from analogy you see that the iniquity of the Turk is not quite full, but it is filling rapidly, and there is a power and pressure behind all these Governments now that will compel the destruction of that wicked Power in the near future and the opening up of Palestine to the full restoration of Israel. This is in the purpose of God.

I will just take you for one moment to the second Psalm. Do not forget that, for you hear it at nearly every missionary meeting: "Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession. Just read a verse or two back and you will find that God sets his King upon his holy hill of Zion before that comes to pass. Jesus is the King there on the holy hill of Zion, reigning in Mount Zion, before you have the heathen given him for his inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession.

AMONG WILD AFRICAN TRIBES.

Four Mission Stations Opened by the Africa Inland Mission in Ten Months
—A Wonderful Record—Many Perils, but Preserved Amid them All.

UBTLESS many readers of this journal will recall the account, published in these pages eight months ago, of the expedition undertaken by Dr. P. Cameron Scott and a party of American and English missionaries in East Africa, and the opening of the first station of the Africa Inland Mission at Nzawi. In the party were three ladies and five men. On reaching Mombasa, the women were left there, while the men went forward to select a site for the Mission in the interior. They found a suitable spot on a little hill in the Nzawi Valley near the river of that name, and leaving four men to begin operations, Dr. Cameron Scott returned to convey the women to the scene of their future labors.

A letter just received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD relates how the Mission and its founders have fared since the first letter was received. Dr. Scott writes:

During my stay at the coast, I found it necessary to send one of the ladies of our party home, reducing our number to seven. On February 3, with a caravan of 110 men, we bade good-bye to the comforts of civilization and started for the interior, this time having a settled point toward which we might steer our caravan. We arrived February 28, found the brethren well, and a brick-house well-nigh completed. We were rejoiced to be together once more, and also glad to find that the natives still continued friendly.

It was deemed advisable to open another station as soon as possible; and with this end in view, I set off once more, striking off in an east-north-east direction, and on the 11th of March came into the district of Sakai, where I pitched my camp, surrounded by a howling, angry mob. They were at first very much opposed to my project of building, but after much trial of faith the work was begun in Sakai, and on the 18th of March Mr. Hotchkiss came over from Nzawi to take charge of the station, and occupy the little grass house that had been built for his reception.

Leaving Sakai, I travelled for several days through Kilbouni, Kinaki, Kilala, and into Kilungu, arriving back at Nzawi on the 23d of March. Still feeling that our force at Nzawi was more than sufficient, we decided once more to "enlarge the place of our tent." We left headquarters, and set out for Kilungu on April 11, where we arrived the same day. A beautiful site was chosen and granted. The district is thickly populated and extensively cultivated. Flowing in front of the station is the Kilungu River, while behind towers Kilungu Peak, 6,500 feet high. A small grass house 12x18 was hastily thrown up, and on the 18th Mr. Krieger came over to take charge of the work, and ever since its establishment we have had much reason to praise God; for since our food supply has failed at Nzawi, we have have been abundantly supplied at Kilungu.

On July 22, we were called to Mombasa, to meet our second party of missionaries, eight in number. The party arrived August 7th, and being detained sometime at the coast, we did not reach Nzawi until the 22d of September. On our arrival we were glad to find all well, and the work in all its branches able to report progress. The party was divided, some going to Kilungu, others to Sakai, some remaining at Nzawi; but here again we found the family too large, and God, in the meanwhile, had made a providential opening for its division. For a long time the people in the district known as Kangundu, seventy miles north of here, were in rebellion against the British authorities. A military post was established in the district and soon the people were brought to terms, and the force withdrawn to Machadoo. During the campaign, a rough wattle and daub structure had been thrown up to serve as a dwelling house for the officers. Her Majesty's Sub-commissioner writing me about this place, spoke of its population, fertility, and other points of interest, making it a good centre for mission work; and offered the place as it stood for a rental of five rupees per year. Our minds were soon made up to accept the offer.

On September 24, we set out to open our fourth station, arriving in Kangundu October 3, and Muma Miki gave us a cordial reception, bringing as presents a large bull which we were to kill and eat, also a cow and a calf, which was to supply us with milk. We found the place exceeded our expectations, as it is perhaps the most fertile spot we have seen. At an elevation of 5,500 feet, shut in by hills, which sheltered you from the strong evening breeze. One hundred miles to the north can be seen the snow-capped peak of Mount Kenia.

Four stations have thus been established and manned in less than ten months after our arrival at Nzawi. During this same period we have made brick for and erected six buildings, besides six good grass dwelling houses; also houses for men, chickens, and goats. Much has also been done in the line of tilling the soil, but most of our effort in the beginning of this year came to grief, owing to the failure of the rain. This season, however, we got our seed down in time, and our hearts are gladdened now to see the whole face of nature changed. Our crops consist of all kinds of vegetables, as well as potatoes, wheat, barley, oats, and buckwheat. We are endeavoring, as much as possible, to make ourselves independent of all European supplies, and make the work in a measure self-supporting.

Our school work has not been large, but carried on faithfully since its inception in March. The school is composed of boys from various sections of this great continent; for Africans are a migratory people. One boy is from far distant Unyoro, another from Msangu in the south, two from Nyanwezi, one from Zanabar, who has traveled all over the Congo, one from the Soudan, the others being from our own districts. Several of these boys are supported in school by friends in America. My sister does not report these boys as being exceptionally brilliant, but faithful. They make splendid vocalists and have phenomenal memories. Another branch of our work has been that of the dispensary, and this has been attended with many good results.

Our work has been distinctively that of pioneering, and we have been working at a great disadvantage, owing to the fact that we knew nothing of the language of the people among whom we have come to labor. Many of us have had much cause for thankfulness in the matter of health, for while none of us have been free from fever, we have been troubled so little, that the attacks are scarcely worth taking notice of.

And now a word might be said about the people among whom we have come to labor. The Wakamba occupy the territory known as Ukamba. It extends from the Tsaro River to Kikuyu. The population is estimated between four and five hundred thousand. The men (a great many of them) are almost naked, with the exception of the brass wire which is freely worn around their necks, arms, waists, and legs. They also make very fine chains out of small brass wire, and great bunches of this is worn in the ears. They are generally well-built fellows, tall, thin, but muscular. As a rule they have straight cut features, high in the forehead, and rather intelligent in appearance. The costume of the women is rather picturesque. In front, they wear a small apron of cloth or goatskin, about five inches deep, by seven in breadth. Behind they wear a long V-shaped piece of hide, which reaches to the knees; they also wear an oval hide fastened over the shoulder, which reaches to the hips. The women do not wear so much brass wire, but the quantity of beads some of them carry around their waist and neck, is really wonderful. They are an agricultural people, and also possess large herds of cattle and goats. Their weapons of defense are chiefly the bow and arrow and a long sword. Their houses are small conical grass huts, with a door so small, that it is with difficulty you can crawl in when down on "all fours."

We have had times of trial; also times of blessing and times of sorrow; but also times of joy; patience has been put to the test, but God has answered prayer; our need in every particular has been very great; but his promise has not failed. Our hearts are full of thanksgiving for all the marvels of his grace.

Mission Progress in Korea.

Dr. John B. Busted, medical missionary at Seoul, Korea, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as follows: "The usefulness and influence of our hospital has been far-reaching, we having had in the wards and treated in the dispensary, patients all the way from Wuju, 250 miles in the north, to Chun Chu, the capital of a wealthy province, 150 miles to the south. Our dispensary work is in excellent running order, with an average daily attendance of fourteen. During the last month we have built an addition to the dispensary, providing doctor's office and dark room for ophthalmoscopic examination of the eye, etc., without any expense to the mission, so you see we have great cause to be thankful. We need for this year: A trained nurse who will volunteer for service; a well equipped surgical ward; the support of two free surgical beds at $37.50; and the support of one free medical bed at $30.00."

Sunday School Converts

Our Missionary Tells of Young Hearts Won to Christ.

WRITING from Kirksville, Mo., Rev. G. W. Sharp, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunday-School missionary, gives this interesting account of a recent missionary tour in a very extensive district: "I arrived at home, terminating a tour of 33 days, during which I had many opportunities of holding forth the Word of Life in families and wayside ministries, and in Sunday Schools and churches. Nearly half the time I labored in a revival meeting at Mt. Hebron Church, Lafayette county. Rev. J. H. Norman, pastor. I have seldom attended a meeting in which the Divine blessing was more manifestly upon every service.

"Sunday School scholars were prominent among the blessed; in one instance

Two Kings of the Heathen.

It is seldom that so marked a contrast is presented as that which is found in the story of two monarchs of little heathen kingdoms, which were lately referred to in some of the daily newspapers. About six years ago, Col. John F. Hobbs was a passenger on a Pacific Ocean steamship that was wrecked in a hurricane. After battling with the water until he was almost exhausted, he was rescued by the natives of a small island, and instead of torturing him, as was their custom, he was spared and kept a prisoner. The tribe, known as the Ililikas, was at war with another tribe at that time, and Col. Hobbs, who soon became popular among them, aided successfully in the defence of the little kingdom. Soon he was looked upon as a special messenger of their heathen deity, and was freed from captivity. In 1890 the native king died, and Col. Hobbs was chosen king. He taught the people a great many useful things and introduced the Gospel on the island. He found the islanders a very simple and unselfish people. Any man who would try to take that which did not belong to him, was despised by the whole population. They were cannibals when he first went to them, but when they were celebrating one of their victories after their usual custom, by devouring their captives, he told them that cannibalism was a flagrant sin, and that when they killed men they were displeasing the Great White Spirit. Since that time cannibalism and murder have not been practised in his kingdom. European nations have asked that they may be permitted to open trading stations on the Ililika Islands, but Col. Hobbs says his people are virtuous and not given to the vices of the white men, and he does not want them to learn such things by admitting the outside world. His people are rather suspicious of white men because they have had painful experiences with slave vessels which made them dread all strangers.

Quite of another sort is king Itanitsuku, of the little monarchy of Okirik in West Africa, who, with his chiefs has lately been making it very disagreeable for any whites who tried to trade with them, frequently seizing their goods, murdering their porters and carrying their heads off to ornament the "juju house." Last June, Mr. Moore, the British Consul-General, demanded that the Okirikas should surrender their king and allow the British marines to destroy the "juju house." They refused, he threatened to bombard the town. The chiefs would not hear of such a thing and returned word to that effect. Mr. Moore, with 150 troops sailed up to Okirik and began the bombardment. The troops landed, destroyed the "juju house" without any interference on the part of the natives, and returned to their vessel taking the king with them. Itanitsuku was taken as prisoner to Degama, but he escaped after a short time. Since the departure of the king the Okirikas have been tractable and quiet. The miserable condition of the country under fetish-worship contrasts strangely with that of the Ililikas, where the "Gospel of Peace" has full sway.

A Utah Mission School's Need

The following, from a subscriber in Salt Lake City, will interest many readers who may be disposed to aid in a deserving work.

"Our Mission Sunday School is located in the very heart of Mormondom, in one of the wards of this city which is conceded to be one of the strongholds of the Mormon church. We have been conducting a Sabbath School in this place for nearly three years, and have found that the best way to get a chance to reach these people is by loaning them good books. To this end the children and friends of the school have been working very hard to get a good library, one with which we can meet the present need. I would like to be placed in correspondence with superintendents of Eastern schools who have books which their children have read, who would be willing and even glad to place the books in a school where they will continue to be a blessing to all who read them. I will personally see that the cartage is paid, so that there will be no extra expense to the donor."

THE TEMPEST.

WILDLY sweeps the tempest o'er the angry sea;

Loudly roar the breakers on the lee;
But God holds the waters safely in his hand;
He will calm the waves by his command:
Peace, be still!

O, how dark the shadows lie upon life's man,
And our hearts are filled with doubt and pain.
Oh, our God and father, hear us we pray;
O, rebuke the waves, dear Lord, and say:
Peace, be still!

We will cast the anchor safe within the veil,
Hiding in its shelter from the gale;
Hear the voice of Jesus bid the tempest cease;
Morning light is breaking in peace, sweet peace—
Peace, be still!

About Church Work.

THE church work which falls to women, ought, in my opinion, always to include church house-keeping. Women have an eye for dust and cobwebs, and a genius for ventilation, not as a rule the portion of the average man, who seldom is willing to acknowledge that a house needs cleaning. For my part, I would have a woman as sexton's assistant, if possible, in every church, just to see that carpets were swept and cushions shaken and books dusted, and the whole sanctuary kept sweet and shining as the good housewife keeps her own home.

Corners now, you remember the old story, don't you, of the converted housemaid, who was asked for an evidence that her change of heart was genuine, and the best thing she could think of—a very good thing, too—was that where formerly she neglected the corners, she now swept them thoroughly. Let us consider the corners, if you please. If we women managed our church house-keeping, we would never let the spider that taketh hold with her hands and is in king's palaces forsooth, make her judgment in any hiding-place in the ceiling or the angles of the walls. We would keep our churches immaculate, pulpit and pew alike, and the fresh air should be so often and so thoroughly introduced, that there would never be an excuse for the congregation to go to sleep under the pastor's sermons.

Church work for women means sewing societies, and missionary meetings, and suppers and fairs, and great sociability, and calling on strangers, and judicious looking after the poor, and much teaching in the Sunday School, and constant loyalty and diligent church-going, and faithful and loving service all round. I know, for there is no department of it in which from my youth up I haven't served an apprenticeship. Women have more command of their time, as a general thing, than their husbands and sons have, and also the working force of the women in a church is numerically larger than the working force of the men.

If St. Paul could say, "Help those women who labored with me in the Lord," if St. John could write to the "elect lady" those children he found walking in truth, and whose home was his resting-place when he could take time from his multiplied labors to rest and enjoy pleasant society, so many a modern minister may with reason bless the women who sustain his hands, and contribute to making his work effective.

One important part of church work as women attend to it is to be careful that nobody is overlooked. There is always the sensitive person in the congregation who is easily hurt, and who feels neglected if her omings in and goings out and her now and then stayings at home are not observed. There are those who have gifts which may be brought out, there are those who need loving insistence to get them into the warm current of church life.

Let us avoid jealousies and strifes and petty ambitions in the service of our God. Dear as our own home should our church come be, as tenderly cherished and as wisely guarded.

The members of our own congregation are more than mere acquaintances, they are our brothers and our sisters in the Lord. So must we be on the alert for their defense if they need to be defended or their help if they are in trouble, for their comfort if they are in sorrow.

One thing to be avoided in our friendly intercourse with church members is anything like patronage. That note should never be struck. It is a pity and a mistake that sometimes those in mission churches feel that they are looked down on by the parent church, and the effect is as bad on those who condescend as on those who suffer from condescension. In the church all men and all women are on the same plane.

While yet the year is young, if any of us have been holding aloof from our rightful share of church work let us amend our ways.

It isn't the thing you do, dear,
It's the thing you leave undone
Which gives you a bit of a heartache
At the setting of the sun.
The tender word forgotten.
The letter you did not write,
The flower you did not send, dear,
Are your haunting ghosts at night.

Let us beware of the sin of omission. Let us stand up for Jesus as never before. Church work, rightly used, is church privilege. As we lift this cross, if cross it be, lo! the Lord himself will bear the heavy end, and the part we carry on our shoulder will be garlanded with roses.

President Kruger and the Lion.

ON one occasion, when a young man, Paul Kruger, now President of the Transvaal, ran a foot race against a picked band of Kaffir chiefs. There were large prizes of good cattle. It was a long whole day's run across country, past certain well-known landmarks—amongst others, his own father's house. Young Kruger soon distanced all his pursuers, and when he reached his father's house he was so far ahead that he went in and had some coffee. His father, however, was so angry at him for running across country without his rifle that he very nearly gave his son a flogging. But he made the boy take a light rifle with him when he left to finish his race. On sped young Kruger, the Kaffir braves toiling after him as well as they could. But, in spite of it all, Paul Kruger kept far ahead of them; and as the day waned he found himself so completely master of the situation that he commenced to look about for an antelope which we might bring into camp by way of replenishing the larder.

He saw through the tall grass a patch of color, which made him think that it belonged to a buck taking his ease. He aimed and pulled the trigger, but the gun missed fire; and instead of an antelope, there bounded up a huge lion, who had been disturbed by the sound. The two faced each other, the lion glaring at Kruger, and he returning that glare by the steady gaze of his fearless eyes. The lion retreated a few steps, and Kruger made as many steps forward; then Kruger commenced slowly taking one step backward, followed by a second, and then a third. But the lion followed every move of Kruger, keeping always the same distance. This work was getting to be very wearing, not to say dangerous, particularly so as darkness was coming on and no sign of relief. Slowly and cautiously Kruger prepared his musket for a second shot. He raised, aimed, and pulled the trigger, but again there was only the snap of the cap, and Kruger saw himself face to face with a lion and no weapon but the stock of a useless rifle. The last snap of the lock had so infuriated the wild beast that he made a spring into the air and landed close to Kruger's feet—so close, indeed, that the earth was thrown up into his face, and he expected to be in the animal's grasp. He raised his gun to deal the animal a blow, but at this the lion retreated, glancing sullenly over his shoulder until he was about fifty yards away; then, as though by a sudden impulse, the beast broke into a furious gallop and disappeared over the next hill. Even after this exciting adventure Kruger won the race.

Cold

Is dangerous. We need heat. The blood must be kept warm, must be rich and pure and must circulate properly. Growing Children

One-third of all the children die before they are five years old. Most of them die of some wasting disease. They grow very slowly; keep thin in flesh; are fretful; food does not do them much good. You can't say they have any disease, yet they never prosper. A slight cold, or some stomach and bowel trouble takes them away easily.

SCOTT'S EMULSION of Cod-liver Oil with Hypophosphites is just the remedy for growing children. It makes hard flesh; sound flesh; not soft, flabby fat. It makes strong bones, healthy nerves. It changes poor children to children rich in prosperity.

Book about it free for the asking.

HEROIC PERSONALITIES

By REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

The Heroism of Forbearance.

WE are accustomed to think of the hero as one who achieves his victories by some positive and aggressive action. It is often, however, as heroic to remain silent under unjust attack as it is to speak in the face of opposition. There is a heroism that bears, as well as a heroism that performs. David on returning from one of his military expeditions declared that the heroism of those who remained behind to care for the baggage, was as deserving as that which went forth to the battle, and in the division of the spoils decided, "As his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff."

Dr. George Lansing Taylor, the well known preacher-poet, was the hero of an incident in his young manhood which well illustrates this important phase of Christian heroism. Dr. Taylor was growing up through boyhood into manhood in Ohio, when he became a Christian and joined the church, and, like many another, had to suffer from his schoolmates. The indignities were hard for a young fellow of fifteen to bear, but he acquired at the very outset of his religious experience a spirit of brotherly love, even for those who abused him.

One day he was sharpening a pencil, when a book slipped off the desk and fell upon the floor. He bent over to pick it up, with his large, sharp jack-knife open in his hand. The boy who was his chief persecutor gave him a kick which drove the knife into it, gushing it fearfully. He shut his hand so tightly as to stop the flow of blood. Then, rising, with no sign of anything having gone wrong, he asked permission to go out. Crossing the street to the house of the nearest doctor, he had the wound sewed up and dressed.

The surgeon was very indignant. "Do you know," said he, "you have come within danger of losing the use of your right hand? Who was it that kicked you? You can make him smart for it. His father can be made to pay well for such a job as that." Who did it?

But the plucky young fellow refused to tell. He was far more anxious to do the boy good than to have him suffer for his meanness. And though he had only mentioned his name to ensure his being severely punished and probably expelled, he never showed by word or look that he resented the injury. The love of Christ had taken all resentment out of his soul.

Six or seven years later he had finished his college course, and had taken the principalship of a school for the training of teachers. Among his pupils was the young man, though older than himself, who had kicked the knife into his hand. The result of young Taylor's heroic forbearance had proved the wisdom of Paul's advice in his letter to the Romans: "Avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written, vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord. Therefore if thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head." The young teacher found that his old-time enemy was now his most devoted friend. There was not one of the scholars more faultlessly loyal to him than the young fellow who had once treated him so cruelly, but had been conquered by his forbearance.

By-and-by there was a great revival of religion among the pupils of the school and many of the students were converted. One afternoon our young man of the jack-knife episode, asked the teacher if he might talk with him a few minutes after school. The request was granted and when they were alone he asked:

"Do you remember the time when I nearly ruined your right hand by a brutal kick?"

The teacher replied that he remembered the occasion very well.

"I had no idea of hurting you so badly," he continued. "I hated you because you had become a Christian. You never seemed to resent it in the least, and now I want to tell you that that jack-knife has been sticking in my heart ever since. Lately the Lord has been twisting it around until the agony has become unbearable. I want you to forgive me, and ask God to help me out of this torment about my meanness."

And there alone together teacher and pupil mingled their prayers at the mercy seat, and the years of remorse were ended and an era of joy and peace came to the young man's soul. From that hour the two young men were brothers in the sweetest friendship, and how glad the young teacher was that he had had the noble courage, and sufficient of the grace of brotherly love, to stifle his resentment in those early days when the provocation had been so strong. How rich the reward of his gentleness and forbearance!

Requests for Prayer.

At the Converts' Sunday Evening Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission, prayer was offered on Jan. 3, in accordance with the requests of many persons, among whom the following ask the prayers of our readers:

For the Conversion of a Mother, of Relatives and Friends. Praying Mother, of Everett, Va., asks the prayers of Christians for the conversion of her dear boys. "Troubled One," Percy, H., that a dear friend and a prominent business man may both be led to Christ. Obstacles of different kinds are keeping each back and there is urgent need for prayer to God to remove them.—H. T. Tioga, Pa., for the conversion of her husband and that a neighbor who is a victim of strong drink may be led to renounce sin and seek strength of the Lord.—Subscriber, Randolph, Ala., for the conversion of an aged mother and of dear children for whom many prayers have been offered.—"Sister in Christ," Weston, that God in mercy would convert her drunken husband and save him from the power of his besetting sin; also that her wandering son may be reared to his home and redeemed from all sin.—Florence, Kan., for the conversion of a sister and two brothers who are all about Christ and without hope.—M. A., Everett, Neb., that her husband and her mother, for whose conversion earnest prayer has been offered for many years, might be led to Christ and be saved by him.—Constant reader, that her husband, father and brother might turn to the Lord and be saved from their sins and made new creatures in Christ.—S. I. D. Goshen, Ind., whose husband is very irreligious and profane, begs prayer for conversion.—Reader, Albany, N. Y., for the conversion of three motherless children, that they may be kept from falling a prey to the temptations of the world.—M. C., Macomb, Ill., for the conversion of two good kindred who are not Christians.—L. J. C. Sterling, O., for the conversion of a whole family of old man, his son, and seven daughters, none of whom know the Lord.—Believer, Jamestown, N. Y., that two brothers who are so absorbed in business that they give no thought to their souls, may be led to seek Christ.—E. W., Corinth, that a family of three children may be brought into the Lord's fold.—Subscriber, Reading, Pa., that a man of very irascible temper may have a new heart and turn to love and serve Christ.—Widowed mother, Springfield, that a son who is breaking his mother's heart by his dishonest propensities, may reform and seek from God the power to lead a righteous life; also that a man who neglecting his home and children may be brought to repentance, and seek forgiveness for his sins through Christ.—"Lover of Jesus," Bearsville, N. Y., for the conversion of two brothers.

For the Restoration of Health. E. W., Essex, Ont., asks prayer for recovery from a distressing nervous complaint which has been a grievous burden for six years past.—Praying Friends, Andover, N. Y., for the recovery of a Christian physician now critically ill, whose many friends are pleading with God for him.—J. F. T., Erie City, N. Y., for the recovery of a young man whose troubles and bondage to strong drink have affected his mental balance.—Reader, Boston Mass., that a brother who is sick in body and mind may be fully restored.—Anxious Sister, Wellsburg, N. Y., for the recovery of a beloved Christian sister who is about to undergo a dangerous surgical operation.—Reader, Hartford, Conn., for recovery from a serious illness, that he may resume preaching the Gospel.—E. R. R., Altamont, N. Y., that a dear sister may be restored to health of body and mind.—J. R. K., Amity, N. Y., for the conversion of herself and her husband.—G. H. M., Stanford, Ky., that a Christian who sorely misses the help derived in the preaching of the Gospel, may have a sense of hearing restored. The following persons also ask prayers that the Great Physician may restore them to health: M. J., Belver; J. A. L., Believer, Racine, Wis.; M. E., Ohio.

For Special Blessings. B. T. L., Baltimore, Md., asks prayer for special guidance in a difficulty, and that he may succeed in winning souls for Christ.—J. H. H., Port Jervis, N. Y., that a husband whose love his wife has been alienated, may be led to see the evil of his conduct and may become as kind as before.—Believer, Golden Gate, for grace to overcome a besetting sin which obstructs his usefulness.—C. F. D., Utica, N. Y., that God would continue to bless him in his work for Christ, and enable him to win more souls for Christ.—Distressed Father, Brooklyn, N. Y., for guidance in a serious difficulty, and that in some way relief may come from a heavy burden.—M. I. S., Middletown, Pa., that a dear brother who is a sincere Christian, may not become weary in well-doing, and that he may be delivered out of a serious trouble.—Hope, who is in very trying circumstances, that God would grant the grace and wisdom most urgently needed.—"Anxious," Philadelphia, Pa., that a backslider be fully restored and may have the assurance that God has fully restored him.—W. A. C., Byerville, O., for a fresh baptism of the Holy Spirit, that he may preach with more power and that his church may be quickened into more vigorous life.—Reader, Polk Co., Mo., that a Christian son now away from home may be kept close to God and may be under his care always, and that his father's heart may be softened and made more forgiving and Christ-like.—Readers, Gazette, Mo., that a bereaved family may be enabled to collect from people who owe them money, the means necessary to their maintenance.—M. J., Toronto, Ont., that the way may be opened to labor in the field to which it has pleased God to call her, wherever it may be.—J. B. Worcester, Mass., that a reconciliation may be effected between two persons now alienated.—"Afflicted One," that God would heal his backslidings and restore to him the joy of salvation.—Lonely Widow, Brattleboro, Vt., that God would care for her, protect her from fraud and imposition, and give her the grace and strength she needs.—G. H. M., Stanford, Ky., that a dear friend who is under a delusion and has conceived a dislike of people who are really friends, may be convinced of the truth and cease to resent imaginary wrongs.—Reader, Chicago, Ill., that in some way employment may be found for one who has long been seeking it.—E. B., Danbury, Conn., that people who owe her money may pay their just debts, so that she may not become a public burden.

Good News for Asthma Sufferers.
We are glad to announce that the Kola plant, recently discovered on the Congo River, West Africa, has proved itself a sure cure for Asthma, as claimed at the time. We have the testimony of sisters of the gospel, doctors, business men and others, all speaking of the marvelous curative power of this new discovery. Hon. L. G. Clute, of Levee, Iowa, writes that he could not lie down at night or day from Asthma, and the Kola Plant cured him at once. Rev. G. Ellsworth Stump, pastor of the Congregational Church at Newell, Iowa, cured by it of Asthma of twenty years' standing, and many others give similar testimony. To prove to you beyond doubt its wonderful curative power, the Kola Importing Co., No. 114 Broadway, New York, will send a large case of the Kola compound free by mail to every reader of The Christian Herald who suffers from any form of Asthma. In return they only ask that you tell your neighbors of it when cured yourself. This is very fair; and we advise all sufferers from Asthma to read the Case. It costs you nothing.

New Cure for Kidney and Bladder Diseases, Rheumatism, etc. — Free to all Readers.

All readers will be glad to know that the new botanical discovery, Alkavis, has proved an assured cure for all diseases caused by uric acid in the blood, or by disordered action of the kidneys or urinary organs. It is a wonderful discovery, with a record of hospital cures in 30 days. It acts directly upon the blood and kidneys, and is a true secret. The cure is in a large Rev. W. B. Mason, D. D., of Washington, to this in the New York Christian Herald. That Alkavis completely cured a case of Kidney and bladder disease of many years' standing. Many ladies also testify to its great power. Dealers are everywhere. Write to the New York Christian Herald, Cure Company, No. 401 Fourth Avenue, New York, are the only importers of this new remedy, and they are so anxious to make it available for the sake of suffering humanity that they will send a trial of Alkavis, for all ailments connected with the kidneys or bladder disease, Brucella Disease, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Gravel, Pain in Back, Female Complaints, or other ailments due to impure action of the kidneys or urinary organs. We advise all sufferers to send their names and address to the company, and receive the Alkavis free. It is sent to you entirely free, to prove its wonderful curative powers.

"BEHOLD THE MAN."

BEHOLD the Man, Christ Jesus, with the thorn upon his brow,
And his eyes so grave and tender as he looks upon them now.
His body bruised and bleeding, but his heart is strong and brave,
He cometh from His father, the lost to seek and save.
How they cried, "Oh, crucify him," would they crucify their King.
No fault could be found in him, no true charge could they bring.
But cruel in their madness they crucify our Lord.
He, like the lamb that's slaughtered, spake back no answering word.

Still he stands so pure and holy; a cruel thorn you drove
When you denied his mercy, his sacrificing love.
He died, the Friend of Sinners he lives, oh, wondrous plan!
And we who now do love him, we say "Behold the Man."
Oh, when my heart beheld him whose side was pierced for me,
I bowed low, in my sadness, by Calvary's rugged tree,
I gazed into his shining face, it looked so pale and wan.
But, oh, he smiled, my soul was saved, as I beheld the Man.

Oh, sinner friend, God loves you; his dearest precious love,
He sent with Jesus to you, right from the throne above.
Behold the Man, Christ Jesus, he bids thee look and live.
He says that whosoever comes to him, he will forgive.
The "whosoever," brother, that message is for you,
For all who come to Jesus do find the promise true.
Sinner, behold thy Saviour, forgiveness full and free,
If you come and kneel before him, our Christ will speak to thee,

TIME TELLS THE STORY.

SINGER SEWING MACHINES do Good Work DURING A LIFETIME.

There is a big difference between the cost of making a first-class sewing machine, embodying the best of materials and workmanship, and one made in the cheapest manner. The buyer of the cheap machine soon pays the difference of price in the constant cost for repairs, to say nothing of its annoying inefficiency.

Results Make Reputation.

Singer Machines, either lock-stitch or chain-stitch, are the successful result of long experience and constant improvements in the endeavor to make nothing but the best sewing machines for family use. The accomplishment of this result requires six of the largest, best-equipped factories in the world, the best inventive talent of the age, and the constant employment of twelve thousand workmen. Singer Machines are sold only by our employees, and not through dealers or department stores.

The Value of Reputation.

A reputation based on half a century's experience, dealing directly with the women of the family all over the world, is unique, and stimulates a worthy pride. THE SINGER MANUFACTURING COMPANY aims to maintain its well-earned reputation for fair dealing during all time. It is permanent, its offices are in every city in the world, and parts and supplies for its machines can always be easily obtained.

The Singer Manufacturing Co.

"SEWING MACHINE MAKERS FOR THE WORLD."

$500 IN GOLD GIVEN AWAY

We have had a number of word contests in the past and prizes have been awarded fairly. In this contest you are sure of getting the money to which your list entitles you. We first adopted this contest this season. We have given away $800, since we began these word contests, to 94 persons who would like to publish the names and addresses of all the winners, but it would take too much space to publish, however, the names and addresses of the winners of first prizes in each of our preceding contests are: $50.00—H. M. Seel, 137 W. 94th St., New York City; $10.00—Miss M. Louisa Allen, Village, Marion, Mass.; $20.00—E. H. Burt, West Winfield, N. Y.; $10.00—Mrs. O. H. Coolidge, 93 N. Rutland, Vt.; $20.00—Mrs. Emily Burt, West Winfield, N. Y. This is our largest and best contest.

$500 IN GOLD FREE 61 Prizes, aggregating $1 a Genuine Bona-Fide Offer.

For prizes. No trash. Here is our proposition: can form the greatest number of words, letters in INSTRUCTION? You can make or more words, we feel sure, and if you do receive a good reward. Do not use any language except English. Words spelled alike, but with meanings, can be used but once. Use any dictionary. Plurals, pronouns, nouns, verbs, adverbs, suffixes, adjectives, proper nouns, allowed. Anything that is a legitimate word will be allowed out in this contest. INSTRUCTION. In, Thin, Fish, Sun, Son, Sun, Seize, Sun, etc. The publisher of WOMAN'S WORLD AND JESSIE MILLER MONTHLY will pay $100.00 in gold to the person able to make the largest list of words from the letters in the word INSTRUCTION, $50.00 for second largest; $25.00 for each of the next three largest lists; $20.00 to each of the next three; $15.00 to each of the next three; $10.00 to each of the next nine; and $2.00 to each of the next forty largest lists—sixty-one prizes in all to the sixty-one largest lists. Don't you think you could be one of these sixty-one? You will enjoy the making of the list. Why not try for the first prize? The above rewards are given free and without consideration for the purpose of attracting attention to our handsome woman's magazine, thirty-two to thirty-six pages, each page containing four long columns, finely illustrated, and all original matter, long and short stories by the best authors; price $1.00 per year. It is necessary for you, to enter the contest, to send 25 cents (money-order, silver or stamps), for a three months' trial subscription with your list of words, and every person sending the 25 cents and a list of twenty words or more is guaranteed an extra present by return mail (in addition to the magazine) of a 100-page book, BESIDE THE BONNIE BRIER BUSH, by the famous Ian MacLaren. This book has more attention in the United States than any book of recent years. We give plain unabridged edition, handy size, finely printed. Satisfaction guaranteed, or money refunded. Lists should be sent at once, and not later than April 25. Our publication has been established ten years. We refer you to any title agency for our standing. Make your list now. Address JAMES H. A Misty Morning.*

WE awoke the next morning to the ominous sound of falling rain-drops. One look through the opening of our tent-like awning, and we knew what was before us. It was yet a prospect as the eye could light have seen in England. The skies seemed to have come down several thousands of feet nearer the earth, as if to make their approach the more effective. The river had lost all its spirit. Whatever turning of the tide it was, the river itself, under the merciless pelting of raindrops, appeared to have come to a dead standstill. Trees, shrubs, reeds, all were in floods of tears; and the landscape in general had the same look as the cows out in the open, of enduring with the passive patience of animal resignation. After breakfast came to our rescue. He proceeded to turn the little cabin into a nest of warmth and cosiness. Some flowers, the victims of his attack of the evening before the meadows, were placed upon the table; cushions were piled high in the corners; and, as we were briskly reminded, "them there boxes was a lot o' readin' stuff, if we wanted it." This timely reminder sent our spirits up with a bound. After luncheon it had cleared in earnest. The clouds were rolling up their gray and white curtains, and the face of a melting summer noon came from behind them. I checked the breath of the wet, moist earth, laden with the vigor of an unbreathed freshness, swept the nostrils; every bush and tree seemed to produce its orchestra; thrushes and blackbirds were singing as if to burst their throats with gladness. The river, in a twinkling, had become a lake of radiance; it lapped and gurgled as if like some happy, conscious creature. Merry fanned creatures came out of the river depths to take a look at the sun; and upon the meadows some of those aerial shapes seemed to have found wings of shimmering texture with which to dance from flower to flower.

Concerning Culture.*

THE process of culture is an unfolding and enrichment of the human spirit by conforming to the laws of its own growth; and the result is a broad, free human life. Culture is never quantity, it is always quality of knowledge; it is never an extension of ourselves, additions from without, it is always enlargement of ourselves by development from within; it is never something acquired, it is always something possessed; it is never a result of accumulation, it is always a result of growth. That which characterizes the man of culture is not the extent of his information, but the quality of his mind; it is not the mass of things he knows, but the sanity, the ripeness, the soundness of his nature. A man may have great knowledge and remain uncultivated; a man may have comparatively limited knowledge and be minutely cultivated. There have been famous scholars who have remained crude, unripe, inharmonious in their intellectual life, and there have been men of small scholarship who have found all the fruits of culture. The man of culture is one who has so absorbed what he knows that it is part of himself. His knowledge is not only enriched specific faculties, it is enriched him.

Mother and Son.

Both Sorely Afflicted, but Relief is Found in Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People.

From the Call, Lafayette, Ind.

The Call has known the Byers family, of Talbot, Ind., for a long time, and J. W. Byers is one of those deliberate men who say little, but read and observe much. Mr. Byers has been suffering for the past three years with grip and kindred troubles. His mother has ever been a sufferer, resulting later in the most aggravating form of rheumatism. Some time ago Mr. Byers was persuaded by a neighbor to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. It didn't take long to set Mr. Byers to talking about this remedy, and the Call sent a special representative to his home to ascertain the exact facts. The subjoined sworn statement of Mr. Byers is sufficient. It tells the facts simply and briefly:

"I know positively that I was cured by Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. I was persuaded by one of my neighbors, Maxen Williams, to try them, as he claimed to have been cured by them. I had the grip three times, and was taken down with rheumatism, and did not expect to live. The doctors said I would never get well. They advised me to take a change of climate. I was reduced from one hundred and thirty-five to one hundred and five pounds. As soon as I began taking the Dr. Williams' Pink Pills I began to gain strength and the use of my limbs was restored. I had been almost helpless for two years, the stiffness in my limbs had been painful in the extreme. But with the use of the pills the pain ceased and now I am as limber and active as when a boy.

"I was also troubled a great deal with my kidneys, but the ailment has entirely disappeared. I have been a subject for the doctors for a long time. Two reputable physicians had treated me for months, and I had spent a large amount of money for patent medicines, but to no avail. As I said, I finally took Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and here I am well. I believe that is the most wonderful remedy ever made. I need not extol this remedy for all my neighbors know what my condition was and what cured me. They will all tell you that it was Dr. Williams' Pink Pills.

My mother, who is seventy years old, was also troubled with rheumatism and could scarcely move. She was very wakeful at night and had no appetite. She took five boxes of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills and now she is in perfect health, and does all her own work on a farm.

(Signed) "J. W. BYERS."

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 10th day of August, 1896.

JAMES GOODWINE, Notary Public.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People are considered an unfailing specific for such diseases as locomotor ataxia, partial paralysis, St. Vitus' dance, sciatica, neuralgia, rheumatism, nervous headache, the after effects of la grippe, palpitation of the heart, pale and sallow complexions, that tired feeling resulting from nervous prostration; all diseases resulting from vitiated humors in the blood, such as scrofula, chronic erysipelas, etc. They are also a specific for troubles peculiar to females, such as suppressions, irregularities and all forms of weakness. In men they affect a radical cure in all cases arising from mental worry, overwork, or excesses of whatever nature. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are sold by all dealers, or will be sent postpaid on receipt of price, 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 (they are never sold in bulk or by the 100), by addressing Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y.

How To Make Poultry Pay

"Worth her weight in gold" is a phrase sometimes applied to a good laying hen. Many hens may become good layers by properly directed care. Some hens earn $2.50 each per year. Every one of YOUR hens can and will earn a net profit of $1.50 each per year if you will use the methods taught by Farm-Poultry, the most practical progressive guide to success in raising poultry. It is edited by men who devote their time to raising poultry and eggs for market; to thoughtful study of the right methods and means to make the most profit from the least number of fowls. The knowledge that has cost these men years of hard work to obtain, you may gain by faithful study of the practical, helpful matter in each issue of

$500 FOR A TOMATO

The Engraving shows the most wonderful Tomato ever offered, which was grown by W. M. Finley, Salem, Ill., who writes: "They grew over 7 ft. high, and I began to pick ripe tomatoes June 24, and had an abundance all summer. Was two weeks earlier than any other variety I ever had, and of the best quality. I had 11 plants, and each one produced from 1 to 2 bushels of nice fruit, many mammoth ones, not a poor one the whole season, and Oct. 15 was still loaded with ripe and green fruit." This Giant Everbearing Tomato is entirely new and a wonder to all. After once grown you will have no others. We own all the seed there is, and will pay $500 for 1 of them weighing 3 lbs. Plant some, you may get the 3 lb. tomato. Instructions with seed and how to grow them. FIRST IN MARKET. CABBAGE is the earliest kind in the world and you will have heads weeks before your neighbors.

GIANT FLAT DUTCH is the largest Cabbage of all. Is all head and always sure to head, weighing 20 to 50 lbs. JAPANESE CLIMBING CUCUMBER. Wonderful variety from Japan. Will climb a trellis, wire netting or any support 6 to 8 ft. Great curiosity, round, good quality, excellent keepers.

EARLY SNOWBIRD. TURNIP. Is the earliest in the world, easy grown, good size, white as snow.

We will send a packet each of above 6 splendid varieties and our Great Catalogue for only 25 cts. If you mention this paper and send silver or M. O. we will send free for the ladies, 100 Summer Flowering Bulbs.

FAMOUS GOSPEL SINGERS OF TO-DAY

Heavenly Recognition.

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: II. Sam. 12: 23: "I shall go to him."

HERE is a very sick child in the abode of David the king. Disease, which stalks up the dark lane of the poor and puts its smothering hand on lip and nostril of the wan and wasted, also mounts the palace stairs, and bending over the pillow, blows into the face of a young prince the frosts of pain and death. Tears are wine to the King of Terrors. Alas! for David the king. He can neither sleep nor eat, and lies prostrate on his face, weeping and wailing until the palace rings with the outcry of woe.

What are courtly attendants, or victorious armies, or conquered provinces, under such circumstances? What to any parent is all splendid surrounding when his child is sick? Seven days have passed on. There, in that great house, two eyelids are gently closed, two little hands folded, two little feet quiet, one heart still. The servants come to bear the tidings to the king, but they cannot make up their minds to tell him, and they stand at the door whispering about the matter and David hears them and he looks up and says to them, "Is the child dead?" "Yes, he is dead." David rouses himself up, washes himself, puts on new apparel, and sits down to food. What power hushed that tempest? What strength was it that lifted up that king whom grief had dethroned? Oh, it was the thought that he would come again into the possession of that darling child. No grave-digger's spade could bide him. The wintry blasts of death could not put out the bright light. There would be a forge somewhere that with silver hammer would weld the broken links. In a city where the hoofs of the pale horse never strike the pavement he would clasp his lost treasure. He wipes away the tears from his eyes, and he clears the choking grief from his throat, and exclaims, "I shall go to him."

Was David right or wrong? If we part on earth will we meet again in the next world? "Well," says someone, "that seems to be an impossibility. Heaven is so large a place we never could find our kindred there." Going into some city, without having appointed a time and place for meeting, you might wander around for weeks and for months, and perhaps for years, and never see each other; and heaven is vaster than all earthly cities together, and how are you going to find your departed friend in that country? It is so vast a realm. John went upon one mountain of inspiration, and he looked off upon the multitude, and he said, "Thousands of thousands." Then he came upon a greater altitude of inspiration and looked off upon it again, and he said, "Ten thousand times ten thousand." And then he came on a higher mount of inspiration, and looked off again and he said, "A hundred and forty and four thousand and thousands of thousands." And he came on a still greater height of inspiration, and he looked off again, and exclaimed: "A great multitude that no man can number."

Now I ask, how are you going to find your friends in such a throng as that? Is not this idea we have been entertaining after all a fantasy? Is this doctrine of future recognition of friends in heaven a guess, a myth, a whim, or is it a granitic foundation upon which the soul pierced of all ages may build a glorious hope? In tense question? I very heartily in this audience throbs right into it. There is in every soul here the tomb of at least one dead. Tremendous question! It makes the lip quiver, and the cheek flush, and the entire nature thrill: Shall we know each other there? I get letters almost every month asking me to discuss this subject. I get a letter in a bold, scholarly hand, on gilt-edged paper, asking me to discuss this question, and I say, "Ah! that is a curious man, and he wants a curious question solved." But I get another letter. It is written with a trembling hand, and on what seems to be a torn out leaf of a book, and there and here is the mark of a tear; and I say, "Oh, that is a broken heart and it wants to be comforted."

The object of this sermon is to take this theory out of the region of surmise and speculation into the region of positive certainty. People say, "It would be very pleasant if that doctrine were true. I hope it may be true. Perhaps it is true. I wish it were true." But I believe that I can bring an accumulation of argument to bear upon this matter which will prove the doctrine of future recognition as plainly as that there is any heaven at all, and that the kiss of reunion at the celestial gate will be as certain as the dying kiss at the door of the sepulchre.

Now, when you are going to build a ship you must get the right kind of timber. You lay the keel and make the framework of the very best materials, the keelson, stanchions, plank-shear, counter-timber, knees, transoms, all iron or solid oak. You may build a ship of lighter material, but when the cyclone comes on, it will go down. Now we may have a great many beautiful theories about the future world, built out of our own fancy, and they may do very well as long as we have smooth sailing in the world; but when the storms of sorrow come upon us, and the hurricane of death, we will be swamped—we will be foundered. We want a theory built out of God's eternal Word. The doctrine of future recognition is not so often positively stated in the Word of God as implied, and you know, my friends, that that is, after all, the strongest mode of affirmation. Your friend travels in foreign lands. He comes home. He does not begin by arguing with you to prove that there are such places as London and Stockholm and Paris and Dresden and Berlin, but his conversation implies it. And so this Bible does not so positively state this theory as, all up and down its chapters, take it for granted.

What does my text imply? "I shall go to him." What consolation would it be to David to go to his child if he would not know him? Would David have been allowed to record this anticipation for the inspection of all ages if it were a groundless anticipation? We read in the first book of the Bible, Abraham died and was gathered to his people. Jacob died and was gathered to his people. Moses died and was gathered to his people. What people? Why, their friends, their comrades, their old companions. Of course it means that. It cannot mean anything else. So in the very beginning of the Bible four times that is taken for granted. The whole New Testament is an arbor over which this doctrine creeps like a luxuriant vine full of the purple clusters of consolation. James, John, and Peter followed Christ into the mountain. A light falls from heaven on that mountain and lifts it into the glories of the celestial. Christ's garments glow and his face shines like the sun. The door of heaven swings open. Two spirits come down and alight on that mountain. The disciples look at them and recognize them as Moses and Elias. Now, if those disciples standing on the earth could recognize these two spirits who had been for years in heaven, do you tell me that we, with our heavenly eyesight, will not be able to recognize those who have gone out from among us only five, ten, twenty, thirty years ago?

The Bible indicates, over and over again, that the angels know each other; and then the Bible says that we are to be higher than the angels, and if the angels have the power of recognition, shall not we, who are to be higher than they in the next realm, have as good eyesight and as good capacity? What did Christ mean, in his conversation with Mary and Martha, when he said, "Thy brother shall rise again?" It was as much as to say, "Don't cry. Don't wear yourselves out with this trouble. You will see him again. Thy brother shall rise again."

The Bible describes heaven as a great home circle. Well, now, that would be a very queer home circle where the members did not know each other. The Bible describes death as a sleep. If we know each other before we go to sleep, shall we not know each other after we wake up? Oh, yes. We will know each other a great deal better than now; "for now," says the apostle, "we see through a glass darkly, but then face to face." It will be my purified, enthroned, and glorified body gazing on your purified, enthroned, and glorified body.

Now, I demand, if you believe the Bible, that you take this theory of future recognition out of the realm of speculation and surmise into the region of positive certainty, and no more keep saying, "I hope it is so; I have an idea it is so; I guess it is so." Be able to say, with all the concentrated energy of body, mind, and soul, "I know it is so!"

There are, in addition to these Bible arguments, other reasons why I accept this theory. In the first place, because the rejection of it implies the entire obliteration of our memory. Can it be possible that we shall forget forever those with whose walk, look, manner we have been so long familiar? Will death come and with a sharp, keen blade hew away this faculty of memory? Abraham said to Dives, "Son, remember." If the exiled and the lost remember, will not the enthroned remember?

You know very well that our joy in any circumstance is augmented by the companionship of our friends. We cannot see a picture with less than four eyes, or hear a song with less than four ears. We want someone beside us with whom to exchange glances and sympathies; and I suppose the joy of heaven is to be augmented by the fact that we are to have our friends with us when there rise before us the thrones of the blessed and when there surges up in our ear the jubilate of the saved. Heaven is not a contraction. It is an expansion. If I know you here, I will know you better there. Here I see you with only two eyes, but there the soul shall have a million eyes. It will be immortality gazing on immortality—ransomed spirit in colloquy with ransomed spirit—victor beside victor. When John Evans, the Scotch minister, was seated in his study, his wife came in and said to him, "My dear, do you think we will know each other in heaven?" He turned to her and said, "My dear, do you think we will be bigger fools in heaven than we are here?"

Again, I accept this doctrine of future recognition because the world's expectancy affirms it. In all lands and ages this theory is received. What form of religion planted it? No form of religion, for it is received under all forms of religion. Then, I argue, a sentiment, a feeling, an anticipation, universally planted, must have been God-implanted, and if God-implanted it is rightfully implanted. Socrates writes, "Who would not part with a great deal to purchase a meeting with Orpheus and Homer? If it be true that this is to be the consequence of death I could even be able to die often."

Among the Danes, when a master dies his servant sometimes slays himself that he may serve the master in the future world. Cicero, living before Christ's coming, said, "Oh, glorious day when I shall retire from this low and sordid scene associate with the divine assemblage, departed spirits and not only with them I have just mentioned, but with my d Cato, the best of sons and most faithful of men. If I seemed to bear his death with fortitude, it was by no means that I did not most sensibly feel the loss I sustained. It was because I was supported by the consoling reflection that we could not long be separated."

The Norwegian believes it. The Indian believes it. The Greenlander believes it. The Swiss believe it. The Turks believe it. Under every sky, by every river, every zone, the theory is adopted; and I say a principle universally implanted must be God-implanted, and hence a belief. The argument is irresistible.

Again, I adopt this theory because it is a feature of moral temperament. It is a feature of the soul that will distinguish us forever. How do we know each other in this world? Is it merely by the color of the eye, or the length of the hair, or facial proportions? Oh, no. It is by disposition as well, by natural affinity using the word in the very best sense, not in the bad sense; and if in the next world our body should perish and lie there ever, and there should be no resurrection, still the soul has enough features and disposition has enough features to make us distinguishable. I can understand in sickness a man will become so delirious that he will not know his own friends, and will be blasted with such insufferable idiocy that, standing beside our friends for all eternity, we will not guess who they are?

Again, I think that one reason why I ought to accept this doctrine is because we never in this world have an opportunity to give thanks to those to whom we are spiritually indebted. The joy of heaven we are told, is to be inaugurated by a review of life's work. These Christians and women who have been toiling for Christ, have they seen the full result of their work? Oh, no.

In the church at Somerville, New Jersey, John Vredenburg preached for great many years. He felt that his ministry was a failure, although he was a faithful minister preaching the Gospel the time. He died, and died amid encouragements, and went home to God. No one ever doubted that John Vredenburg was a good Christian minister. A little while after his death there came a great awakening in Somerville, and Sabbath two hundred souls stood at the Christian altar espousing the cause of Christ, among them my own father's mother. And what was peculiar in regard to nearly all of those two hundred souls was that they dated their religious impressions from the ministry of John Vredenburg. Will that good Christian man before the throne of God never meet those brought to Christ through his instrumentality? Oh, of course he will know them. I remember one Sabbath afternoon, I went down with the sense of my sins and knowing not God, I took up Doddridge's "Pious and Progress." Oh, what a dark afternoon it was, and I read the chapters I read the prayers, and I tried to make prayers my own. Oh, I must see I Doddridge. A glorious old book he wrote. It is out of fashion now.

There is a mother before the throne of God. You say her joy is full. Is it? Can there be no augmentation of joy? Cannot there be? Her son was a wanderer and a vagabond on the earth, and that good mother died. He broke her part. She died leaving him in the wilderness of sin. She is before the throne of God now. Years pass and that son of his crimes and gives his heart to God and becomes a useful Christian, and enters the gates of heaven. You tell me that that mother's joy cannot be imagined. Let them confront each other, the son and the mother. "Oh," she says, "the angels of God, 'rejoice with me! the dead is alive again, and the lost is found. Hallelujah! I never expected to see this lost one come back.'"

"I see a soul entering heaven at last, with a covered face at the idea that it has so little for Christ, and feeling borne down with unworthiness, and it says to itself, 'I have no right to be here.' A voice from a throne says, 'Oh, you forget that Sunday School class you invited to Christ! I was one of them.' And another voice says, 'You forget that poor man to whom you gave a loaf of bread, and told of the heavenly bread. I was that man.' And another says, 'You forget that sick one to whom you gave medicine for the body and the soul. I was that one.' And then Christ, from a throne overtopping all, rests, and says, 'Inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these, you did it to me.' And then the seraphs will take their wings from the side of the throne, and cry, 'What song shall it be?' And Christ, looking over the harpers, shall say, 'It shall be the Harvest Home!'

One more reason why I am disposed to accept this doctrine of future recognition is that so many in their last hour on earth have confirmed this theory. I speak not of persons who have been delirious in their last moments and knew not what they were about, but of persons who died in calmness and placidity, and who were naturally superstitious. Often the glories of heaven have struck the dying pillow, and the departing man has said he saw and heard those who had gone away from him. How often it is in the dying moments parents see their departed children and children see their departed parents. I came down to the banks of the Hawk River. It was evening, and I wanted to go over the river, and so I called my hat and shouted, and after awhile I saw some one waving on the opposite bank, and I heard him shout, 'The boat came across, and I got in.' I was transported. And so I suppose will be in the evening of our life. We come down to the river of death and see a signal to our friends on the other shore, and they will give a signal back to us, and the boat comes, and our departed loved ones are the oarsmen, the fires of the coming day tingeing the tops of the hills.

Oh, have you never sat by such a death-bed? In that hour you hear the departing cry, "Hark! look!" You hearkened, you looked. A little child pining away because of the death of its mother, sitting weaker and weaker every day, is taken into the room where hung the picture of her mother. She seemed to be looking at it, and then she was taken away, and after awhile died. In the last moments that waned and wasted little one held her hands, while her face lighted up with the glory of the next world, and cried, "Mother!" Do you tell me she did not see her mother? She did. So in my settlement at Belleville a plain man said to me, "What do you think I heard last night? I was in the room where one of my neighbors was dying. He was a good man, and he said he heard the angels of God singing before the throne. I haven't much poetry about me, but I ended and I heard them, too." Said I, "I have no doubt of it." Why, we are taken up to heaven at last by minister-spirits. Who are they to be? Souls that went up from Madras, or Antioch, or usalem? Oh, no! our glorified kindred going to troop around us. Heaven is not a stately, formal place, as sometimes hear it described, a very frigate of splendor, where people stand on cold formalities and go around about with heavy crowns of gold on their heads. No, that is not my idea of heaven. My idea of heaven is more like this: You are seated in the evening-tide by the fireplace, your whole family there or nearly all of them there. While you are seated talking and enjoying the evening hour, there is a knock at the door and the door opens, and there comes in a brother that has been long absent. He has been absent, for years you have not seen him, and no sooner do you make up your mind that it is certainly he than you leap up, and the question is who shall give him the first embrace. That is my idea of heaven—a great home circle where they are waiting for us. Oh, will you not know your mother's voice there? She who always called you by your first name long after others had given you the formal "Mister"? You were never anything but James, or John, or George, or Thomas, or Mary, or Florence to her. Will you not know your child's voice? She of the bright eye and the ruddy cheek, and the quick step, who came in from play and flung herself into your lap, a very shower of mirth and beauty? Why, the picture is graven in your soul. It cannot wear out. If that little one should stand on the other side of some heavenly hill and call to you, you would hear her voice above the burst of heaven's great orchestra. Know it! You could not help but know it.

O heaven! sweet heaven! You do not spell heaven as you used to spell it, he-a-v-e-n, heaven. But now when you want to spell that word you place side by side the faces of the loved ones who are gone, and in that irradiation of light and love, and beauty and joy, you spell it out as never before, in songs and hallelujahs. Oh, ye whose hearts are down under the sod of the cemetery, cheer up at the thought of this reunion. Oh, how much you will have to tell them when once you meet them.

How much you have been through since you saw them last. On the shining shore you will talk it all over. The heartaches. The loneliness. The sleepless nights. The weeping until you had no more power to weep, because the heart was withered and dried up. Story of vacant chair, and empty cradle and little shoe only half worn out never to be worn again, just the shape of the foot that once pressed it. And dreams when you thought that the departed had come back again, and the room seemed bright with their faces, and you started up to greet them, and in the effort the dream broke and you found yourself standing amid-room in the midnight—alone. Talking it all over, and then, hand in hand, walking up and down in the light. No sorrow, no tears, no death. Oh, heaven! beautiful heaven! Heaven where our friends are. Heaven where we expect to be.

Oh, how they bound in, these spirits before the throne! Some shout with gladness. Some break forth into uncontrollable weeping for joy. Some stand speechless in their shock of delight. They sing. They quiver with excessive gladness. They gaze on the temples, on the palaces, on the waters, on each other. They weave their joy into garlands, they spring it into triumphal arches, they strike on timbrels, and then all the loved ones gather in a great circle around the throne of God—fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, sons and daughters, lovers and friends, hand to hand around about the throne—the circle, hand to hand, joy to joy, jubilee to jubilee, victory to victory, "until the day break and the shadows flee away. Turn, my beloved, and be like a roe or a young hart upon the mountains of Bethel."

Oh, how different it is on earth from the way it is in heaven when a Christian dies! We say "Close his eyes." In heaven they say, "Give him a palm." On earth we say, "Let him down in the ground." In heaven they say, "Hoist him on a throne." On earth it is, "Farewell, farewell." In heaven it is "Welcome, welcome." And so I see a Christian soul coming down to the river of death, and he steps into the river, and the water comes up to the ankle. He says, "Lord Jesus, is this death?" "No." "And he wades still deeper down into the waters until the flood comes to the knee, and he says, "Lord Jesus, tell me, tell me, is this death?" "No." And Christ says, "No, no, this is not death." And he wades still further down until the wave comes to the girdle, and the soul says, "Lord Jesus, is this death?" "No," says Christ, "this is not." And deeper in wades the soul till the billow strikes the lip, and the departing one cries, "Lord Jesus, is this death?" "No," says Christ, "this is not." But when Christ had lifted this soul on a throne of glory, and all the pomp and joy of heaven, came surging to its feet, then Christ said, "This, oh transported soul! this is death!"

A GREAT PREACHER'S VISIT

Rev. F. B. Meyer Crosses the Atlantic to Continue the Good Work Commenced in New York and Boston by Messrs. Moody and Sankey.

ONE of the most significant events of this revival season is the visit of the Rev. F. B. Meyer of London, to New York and Boston. Mr. Meyer is crossing the Atlantic for a ten days' journey in the two cities. He is expected to arrive on February 3, and to preach in Tremont Temple, Boston, on February 4, 5, 6, and 7. On February 8, he expects to reach New York, and will preach in Carnegie Music Hall on that and four following days. On February 13 he sails for England. It is not often that so long a journey is taken for so few services, but Mr. Meyer cannot remain a longer time away from his work, yet he is anxious to do all that is in his power to turn to account the blessed movement inaugurated by Mr. Moody's labors in the two cities. Probably there is no preacher so well fitted as Mr. Meyer to follow Mr. Moody in this work. His preaching is earnest and practical, and he has that peculiarly winning persuasive manner which has led so many hesitating souls to decide for Christ. His success in his London pastorate, where he succeeded Dr. Newman Hall, has been phenomenal. This church with its famous tower, named Lincoln Tower after our Martyr President, is well known to American visitors to London. A visit to it and a study of its many and varied forms of Christian usefulness are sources of inspiration which have been felt by many earnest workers. But it is not visitors only that have acknowledged their obligations to Mr. Meyer. Thousands of American Christians have been blessed by the reading of his little volumes which are issued from the press of the Fleming H. Revell Company of New York and Chicago, and have had a very extended circulation. Frederick B. Meyer, whose portrait appears in this column is but a little over forty years of age. He is one of those exceptional Christians whose experience should be quoted for the encouragement of some who are troubled by doubts as to their own standing. Though so eminent in service and so truly spiritual in life, he has no recollection of his conversion. After a brief business experience, he entered Regent's Park College, England, to study for the ministry. His first charge was at Liverpool as co-pastor of Rev. C. M. Barrell, of Pembroke Baptist Church. Thence he went to York where he assisted Messrs. Moody and Sankey in one of their most remarkable seasons of blessing. But it was in 1874 when Mr. Meyer settled at Leicester that the great work of his life began. Leicester is a town of hard headed, studious workmen. Their condition weighed heavily on the young pastor's heart. They would not come to church, and the church was too conservative to approach them, or hold out a hand cordially to them. Mr. Meyer wanted to win them and to do so he resigned his pastorate, quitted the sheep in the sheep-fold to go after the straying ones. The pile of buildings known as Melbourne Hall was erected for him when the Christian employers of the town discovered what he was trying to do. Sunday and week-nights the men and women who knew that Mr. Meyer had given himself to them, crowded it to suffocation. In a few years eight hundred of them made profession of faith. They confessed that until Mr. Meyer preached to them they had misunderstood Christianity and had opposed it in ignorance of its value. Twenty-three hundred children were gathered in the Sunday School of which Mr. Meyer himself was superintendent. Lectures and classes were held in the adjoining building every night of the week, and a library and reading-room and restaurant occupied another adjunct. Then Mr. Meyer carried the war into the enemy's country by opening services in other parts of the town, by mission visitors and other agencies, and these, too, were much blessed. Another novel feature of the work was the "prison breakfasts." The pastor was a daily visitor at the prison and he was always there in the early morning when the prisoners who had served their terms were discharged. They were invited to breakfast at Melbourne Hall, and after the meal Mr. Meyer gained their confidence in his happy genial way and offered to help them to lead honest lives. The number of men rescued from criminal lives by these means is astonishing.

At the present time Mr. Meyer is pastor of Christ Church, London, where he is continuing his aggressive spiritual work.

Mr. Meyer, in addition to his pastoral labors, has found time for effective literary work. Among his best known books are Reveries and Realities, a graphic description of life and work in London, and The Belts of Is (published by Fleming H. Revell & Co., New York), a series of delightful "Echoes" from Mr. Meyer's early pastorates.

TRUE AND FALSE GIVING.

Sunday School Lesson for Feb. 7.
Acts 4: 32-37; 5: 1-11. Golden Text,
1. Sam. 16: 7. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart." (1. Sam. 16: 7.) The spiritual birth of those who were born of God at Pentecost was healthy and vigorous. No need was there in those days to ask whether a man was a Christian; all his life and all his spirit went exactly counter to that of the unconverted around him; he was a new creature; old things had passed away; behold all things had become new, and all things were of God. (11. Cor. 5: 17, 18.) It was "newness of life" which was manifested by them, a harvest resulting from the corn of wheat which fell into the ground and died (i.e., Christ's death), and so brought forth much fruit "after his kind" in the lives of his disciples. In the world around, all men were seeking to please themselves, exalt themselves, better themselves, indulge themselves, whereas "Christ Pleased not Himself,"

(Rom. 15: 3), and his followers lived "not unto themselves, but unto him which died for them, and rose again." (11. Cor. 5: 15.) It was a strange phenomenon in the midst of a selfish world when "the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one mind; neither said any of them that aught of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common. . . . Neither was there any among them that lacked: for as many as were possessors of lands or houses sold them, and brought the prices of the things that were sold, and laid them down at the apostles' feet; and distribution was made unto every man according as he had need." It was against all the instincts of nature, for "no man hateth his own flesh, but nourisheth and cherisheth it." (Eph. 5: 29.) It would be considered the veriest folly in the world, for "men will praise thee when thou doest well to thyself." (Ps. 49: 18.) But it was like Jesus, it was Jesus, living his life over again in those in whose hearts he dwelt by faith. It was a heavenly, not an earthly life; its source was above.

"But it was abnormal," say many, "such a life was impracticable; what would become of business, how should we support our families if we lived thus?" When men have real faith in God and act, not from individual eccentricity, or desire to be looked upon as particularly holy, but from a true obedience to the Lord, he does not let them lack. "Neither was there any among them that lacked." "When I sent you without purse, and scrip, and shoes, lacked ye anything?" (1. Luke 12: 35.)

is very rare in the Church now; then it was the Church's characteristic. The very life of the world runs in the current of: "All seek their own," but the early Church had nothing she would call her own, but the Lord who had bought her. The selfish principle in her members, with which God cannot unite, had been superseded by the Spirit of Christ, and God had full right of way with all his children. There was nothing to hinder the Holy Ghost, and thus "with great power gave the apostles witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus, and great grace was upon them all." How could it be otherwise? Men saw the hidden life shining through these transparent temples of the Holy Ghost, and they were in the presence of God who was in his people.

But wherever God works, the enemy counterfeits his working. Open opposition does more to further Christ's kingdom than almost anything else: the Gospel thrives, and Christians grow and develop in times of persecution. When, however, the outward semblance of devotion to Christ covers a heart in which self reigns, the silver becomes dross, the wine mixed with water. (Isa. 1: 22.) All was not gold even among these first disciples. There was a man amongst them who wanted to get the credit for giving all his possessions, and for possessing the same spirit of disinterestedness as actuated the remainder, while his faith in God was so little that he kept back a part of the price of his land against the time of need. In the depth of his heart Ananias believed he could do better for himself than God could or would do for him. If he had taken the position which was the true one in his case, he would have acknowledged that he could not count on God as the others did, but that he would give what he felt he could spare. His pride, however, prevented him from being truthful.

The righteous Lord loveth righteousness, his countenance doth behold the upright. (Ps. 11: 7.) The grace of giving is so little understood and practiced in the Church of Christ at this time that, in the light of the days of her infancy she may well be ashamed. What is the real motive which makes many men give. If we could look into their hearts we should hear them say, "How much is expected of me? How much will so and so be likely to give?" Such a thought as that all they possess is not their own but the Lord's, does not seem to strike them, and thus, many will give to a church or mission when they may, by their gift, secure a certain position. After all, this is in heart no gift at all, but only an investment of money for a certain return to themselves. Some do not invest in Christian work for position or influence, but for personal credit. The subscription list is of interest to them as a means of comparing themselves with others to their own advantage; they nourish their own pride by their giving. How surprised would these men be if a modern Peter were to tell them the startling fact that they are acting the part of an Ananias!

It was an awful moment for Ananias when those eyes which are as a flame of fire (Rev. 1: 14), looked straight through the Apostle Peter upon him, and spoke the words which were to seal his doom: "Ananias, why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie to the Holy Ghost and to keep back part of the price of the land? While it remained, was it not thine own, and after it was sold was it not in thine own power? Why hast thou conceived this thing in thine heart. Thou hast not lied unto man, but unto God." The same word of God which is spirit and life to them that hear and obey is death to those who disobey. It is with the rod of his mouth and by the breath of his lips that God shall smite the wicked. (Isa. 11: 4.) No hand had touched the unhappy man, but he, smitten by the Word of God through Peter, fell down a lifeless mass at the Apostle's feet. An awful lesson against untruth, an awful warning against false profession and mixed motives.

But the sinner was not alone in his transgressions. His wife was party to the transaction. Unlike a true helpmeet, she was one with him in his duplicity. Perhaps the same, three hours and more, which had elapsed since her husband left her to make his donations to the funds of the church alarmed her, and she came to the company of the disciples with the lie still in her heart. She was not prepared for the instant question of Peter. "Tell me whether ye sold the land for so much?" "Yea, for so much," was her unhesitating answer.

O the shock of the words which followed from the lips of the man who saw in the power of the Holy Ghost right down into her crooked heart! "How is it that ye have agreed together to tempt the Spirit of the Lord? Behold, the feet of them which have buried thy husband are at the door and shall carry thee out." No moment to retract: no moment to seek for pardon. The atmosphere of a church united in the holy disinterestedness which counted nothing their own was one in which duplicity and unbelief could not live. O that such an atmosphere were found in the Church of to-day! These were the first deaths in the early Church.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

JOY, enthusiasm, and brotherly love evidently characterized the church in the period described in the lesson. How long it was after Pentecost, we have no means of knowing, but perhaps not many months. It is an interesting picture of social life. To be a Christian in those days was to be a member of a family, and the word "brother," which we still often hear used by some Christians, had a real practical meaning. It is glorious to remember that there has been one time, at least, in the history of the Christian Church when brotherly love was the paramount consideration, and when there was in the church none who lacked anything. But this divine enthusiasm did not continue. A little later we hear (Acts 6: 1) that jealousies were aroused. Some of the people complained of unfairness in the distribution, and the Apostles whose impartiality was challenged, gave way to seven new distributors appointed by the church. There seems to be ground, too, for doubting whether the wholesale distribution was really beneficial in the end. The references to the poverty of the church in Jerusalem later in the Acts, and in Paul's Epistles indicate a permanent condition of pauperism, which may have had its origin in those early alms. If the poor members of the church became accustomed to depend on the daily distributions, and made no exertions for their own support, the distributions may not have been altogether a blessing. It is certain that the need of alms became chronic.

Two contrasted incidents of this communistic period are on record. One of them was Josias Barnabas who sold his property and turned the proceeds into the common treasury. He is the same man who afterward accompanied Paul on his early missionary journeys. Tradition says that he met the great apostle in the school of Gamaliel. According to the story, his parents were wealthy Jews of Cyprus who sent him to Jerusalem to study, but seeing Christ work a miracle and hearing him teach, he became a Christian and brought his sister, Mary, and her son, Mark, the author of the second Gospel, into the fold. He was evidently a generous, impulsive man, and was probably among the first to bring his possessions into the treasury. A very different man was Ananias, whose tragic death is recorded. He had the Pharisee spirit, craving popularity and a credit he did not deserve. Although the record does not state the fact, we infer that Ananias, either in words, or in the manner of his giving, conveyed the assurance that the money he gave was the whole price he had received for his land. Peter appears in some way to have known the actual amount, and to be aware of deception. He reproves the man sharply and reminds him that there was no compulsion on him to offer the gift. He might have kept the land, or have sold it and kept the money, but he sinned grievously in pretending to the Holy Spirit that was doing a thing that he was not doing. Peter pronounced no sentence upon him and was probably as much surprised at the others when he fell down, dead, afterward, when Sapphira entered, she a direct lie, and Peter predicted a similar fate for her, and she, too, died. The chronicle says that "great fear came upon the church," and we can well believe it. The habit of insincerity, of pretence declaring that we are really doing all we can afford to do, that we give ourselves to Christ, "t'is all that we can do," is so common, that these early Christians seeing punishment so swift and terrible fall upon two pretenders, must have been solemn and have realized how dangerous it is to trifle with sacred things.

Kept back part of the price. A boy sires to become a musician. A father of the art, a man whose fame is wide, hears of the boy, examines him, finds that he has talent, and offers to charge of him and make him a musician, on one condition. The must give up himself entirely to the teacher for the conduct of his studies for the disposal of all his time. The teacher is to regulate the time of his rising and going to bed, his diet, the book shall read, the time to be devoted to practice, and the character of his amusement. If the boy will agree to this, there is no doubt of his becoming the finest musician of his time. Suppose the boy agrees, he is very fond of novel-reading. He goes up late at night, he curtails his hours of study, he allows his mind to run on favorite stories while he is practicing music. Would it be surprising if he failed in his musical career? Would his mother be to blame for the failure? The boy kept back part of the price he was to pay for success. When a man goes to God and made his child, he cannot complain if he keeps back a part of the price to give it to the world. He made full surrender.

Great fear came on all. How it surprised a man of the last century were to rise from his grave and see is done now by electricity. It carries messages over the wires; it carries voices for hundreds of miles by telegraph; it supplies us with light; and it gives power to run our cars and machinery. But it is not all it can do. This useful, beneficent agent can kill. See that convicted murderer as he enters the chair in the prison and looks at the chair for him. How he shrinks from it! He knows that seated in that chair a current of electricity will pass through him and stop his life. See the lineman busy with the wires on a telegraph pole. His hand accidentally touches a bare wire, and he falls limp and dead. The electricity is serving us so well and faithfully that it killed him. It is no trifling matter to be in contact with such an agent. Ananias and Sapphira had seen the wonderful works of the Holy Spirit; now they were to experience the awful consequences of trifling with it.

To lie to the Holy Ghost. So far as are told, Ananias told no lie. He appeared to have allowed it to be inferred that he was giving the whole of the money he received for his land. That was a lie which may be quite as bad as a lie that is told. A country teacher relates that once when a class in spelling stood before she put a hard word. The pupil's head spelled it wrongly. She put it next, and the next, right through last, but all failed. She asked the last, a bright, intelligent lad, and he spelled the word rightly as she thought. He was the head of the class above seventeen and girls who were all older than he. Turning around the teacher wrote the word on the black-board that all might see and remember it. But no sooner had the successful little boy read it than he said that it was not spelled as he had spelled it. What should he do? He had only the silence and he would retain his position. But he was not that kind of a boy. "You must have misunderstood me," he said. "I said 'e' not 'i'." And he went to the foot of the class. He was the opposite of Ananias. He did not take credit that did not belong

KINDNESS FOR CRIPPLES.

The Daisy Fields Home at Englewood, N. J., and Its Samaritan Work Among Little Sufferers.

HERE is probably no form of charity which appeals more directly or sympathetically to the heart than that which has a helpless little child for its object. New York City and its suburbs have many institutions for the care, training and education of the tiny waifs who are cast adrift on the world. Our own Children's Home, at beautiful Mont-Lawn, every summer gives shelter, food and recreation to nearly 3,000 neglected tenement children. But for the special cases of the little toddlers who have been so afflicted that they must go through life maimed or crippled, there is comparatively little provision made at the present time.

In the pretty suburban town of Englewood, N. J., about 15 miles from New York, and in one of the pleasantest localities is the Daisy Fields Home and Hospital for crippled children. This worthy institution has been open continuously since June, 1893. Here, surrounded by pleasant inmates and the kindest of nurses, and tended by skilled physicians, during these three-and-a-half years a large number of crippled children have been housed and nursed. All sorts of "cases" are represented among the tiny inmates: some with broken legs or arms, others with dislocations, spinal disease, hip disease, shrunk limbs, etc. The hospital and home is cared for on for the purpose of caring for children who are usually refused admission to their institutions. Many are cripples upon whom the ravages of disease have left their imprint, and who, if not furnished with proper country air and food, would die. Others of the same class have submitted to excisions of joints and other necessary operations, and without the care found in such an institution would relapse and go on from bad to worse. Working with such almost hopeless cases the results have often been marvelous. In most instances the disease is overcome, and the suffering child is restored to health and saved from the misery of a cripple's life. The Daisy Fields Home takes the sufferer and tenderly cares for it until restored to health or until life is closed. During a year only two deaths occurred, one from disease of the spine and one from scarlet fever. After the children are cured they return to their poor homes in the slums of our great cities to be lost in the whirlpool that makes up life there.

The Home is a spacious frame building with an extension, ample grounds and wide verandas. Besides the dormitories it contains commodious play-rooms, operating-room and nurses' quarters. All the unitary arrangements are perfect. Many little cripples from homes of poverty have here found happy surroundings and permanent cure. It is estimated that there are in New York City alone thousands of crippled children receiving little or no attention, who might be cured, or at least greatly helped by such skilled surgical treatment as is given at this charity, which not only seeks to help the child physically but mentally and morally as well. Its kindergarten is a pleasant sight, and it would make older folks smile to see these fragile little ones at play as happy as though they were endowed with the blessing of sound limbs and sturdy bodies. Our illustration shows a trio of girl cripples at play as "little laundresses."

The Daisy Fields Home is supported by contributions from kind-hearted patrons who are interested in the welfare of the little cripples, and wish to help them. Its beneficiaries are poor children. It is warmly endorsed by many pastors and other worthy people who recognize it as a worthy charity that deserves recognition and support from all who are interested in the welfare of the little helpless cripples.

The Palestine Railroads.

A traveler writes: "The single line from Jaffa to Jerusalem hardly pays its expenses at present, and the much-to-be-desired railway from Port Said direct to Jerusalem, which would obviate the difficulties of the landing at Jaffa, can hardly be said to be within the range of practical politics, owing to indifference, if not opposition, in high quarters. But there is no doubt, should the present troubles result in a government really anxious to develop the resources of the country, that a great influx of trade and prosperity would be followed by a gradual reducing of local peculiarities to a dead level of Europeanism, such as we see in Alexandria or Pera.

A lady who has lived in Jerusalem forty years says that the population of the city is constantly on the increase. She says that "twenty-two years ago there were only between fifteen and twenty thousand Jews in Jerusalem. In those days no houses were to be found outside the magnificent walls, the gates of which are closed at night. Since then many changes have taken place, and the Hebrew population—mainly on account of the increase of the Jewish immigration from Russia—now stands at between sixty and seventy thousand."

REACHING PLAIN PEOPLE.

More Approving Comments on Mr. Moody's Plea for Sunday Evening Gospel Services.

URING the present month, many letters have been received approving of the suggestion of Evangelist D. L. Moody, that the Christian Churches of America generally should devote Sunday evenings to the presentation of the plain Gospel for the purpose of reaching the common people. Extracts from several of the letters are given below:

Lancaster, Wis. Meetings Sunday evenings in church here are very rare. About twenty-five have been added to the church during the year, but they resulted from special revival services held in two country appointments where they usually have preaching only once in two weeks. Revival services were also held here, but no conversions. I hope Mr. Moody's suggestion may become a rule in every Protestant church in our land.

Elgin, Neb. We live six miles from town, and have only a schoolhouse to worship in. We have preaching every two weeks at eleven o'clock, A. M., Sunday School every Sunday, and prayer and class here and in Seattle, and with but one or two exceptions, I have heard almost anything else but the pure Gospel.

Ludlow, Vt. Our Sunday evening services are C. E. meeting at 6 o'clock, and presbytery at 7 o'clock, generally. Not one has joined the church for three years, if my memory serves me right.

Sharp, Ky. On Sunday afternoons we hold our Y. P. S. of C. E., and in the evening Gospel services at a school house near the church. Last year between fifty and sixty were added to our church.

Minneapolis, Minn. I am a member of one of the largest churches in Minneapolis. It has a seating capacity of about fifteen hundred or more, but no kneeling capacity. The choir does all of the singing Sunday evening with the exception of one hymn, in which the congregation join. We know that it is utterly impossible, generally to catch a single word that is sung by our modern church choirs. Are we ashamed of our cause? Must our cause be put into the background? We are not gaining by trying to please the ear; we are losing the power of the Holy Ghost.

Cloverdale, Cal. I heartily agree with Mr. Moody in his views on Sunday evening Gospel services. Our Sunday evening services here are of a miscellaneous character. No growth of membership in a year, and no conversions.

Spangle, Wash. There are four churches here, but only three places of worship. There are no regular services in any place at present. There may have been some additions to the churches by letter during the past year. I am not informed on that point. There has been but one conversion here in a long time. I think over two years; that one was last winter. To tell the exact truth, we are spiritually dead.

These letters, as well as others received, are indisputable evidence in support of A Wood-Thrush's Library.

ORNITHOLOGISTS have not presumed to affirm that our birds read either words or music. This, in spite of the constant slaughter of song birds and the unremitting greed for their eggs, iniquities which continue, uncondemned, to augment the scarcity of birds "in the interests of science." True it is, however, that certain of the birds betray a fondness for a bit of reading matter with which to put a finishing touch to the nest. Among these is the wood-thrush, a general favorite among bird-lovers. His wondrous voice, aside from the charm of his warm, tawny back and creamy, heart-spotted breast, holds fixed an attention that wanders from more vivacious, brilliantly arrayed songsters.

This thorn-encircled nest, a photograph of which I send you enclosed, was the unrocked cradle of a brood of young wood thrushes. It was firmly planted against the black trunk of a thorn tree but little above one's head. The thorns below, above, and all about it made near approach impossible, and marked the wise precaution of the stately pair who guarded its contents.

The bottom of the nest flaunts a large, ragged bit of paper, that fluttered in the breeze which bore aloft the adoring chant of the male thrush. This was the library of the wood-thrush, and if its characters were meaningless to the father and mother thrush, perhaps they shared the wisdom of other parents in believing that each new generation may accomplish something undreamed of by its ancestors. Who knows—this may have been a college education designed for their treasured nestlings. This is what the fragmentary surface disclosed:

OUR SERVICE OF SONG.

Conducted by Ira D. Sinkov.

Take my voice

And let me sing

Ever only for my King.

Mark 9: 41.

Bear a cup of loving service sons and daughters of the THWILIGHT TOWN.

Hush, baby, soft and low!

Slow, slow, let us go!

Through the gap in the wall to Twilight Town.

Soft as the wind through rippling wheat,

When the sun's last rays and the shadows meet,

Sounds the patter of thousands of little feet.

Through the gap in the wall on their dimpled knees,

On the grass of the Kingdom, ho-as-you-please.

A BABY'S VOICE SAYS: THYM.

When the baby thrushes were about ready for flight, three curious, unkempt, red-brown heads raised themselves above the nest's brim at the sound of passing foot-steps, and peeped over the menacing thorns with young, inquiring eyes.

A WONDERFUL RESCUE WORK.

The Florence Mission of Kansas City Mo., is doing a wonderful work. At a recent anniversary celebration the managers said that during the past month six thousand women and men had been present at the meetings and one hundred and forty-six of them had declared themselves determined in Christ's strength to renounce their sinful lives. A large number of women, some of whom are well educated and come of highly respectable families, have been rescued from lives of shame and are now in the home, and evidences of their being truly converted.

meeting. There are forty members. I don't think there have been any added to the church, or any conversions in the last year. A revival is needed in this neighborhood.

Fultonville, N. Y. Sunday evening services are held, and the Gospel only preached. We usually have a song service for fifteen minutes, and an after-meeting is frequently held. On no occasion can a sinner leave without hearing the Gospel invitation. Membership in a year has more than doubled—from 30 to 100—and there have been 30 conversions in same period.

Providence, R. I. In looking through the list of Sunday services as published in the Saturday papers, it would appear as though every other subject was preached except Jesus Christ and him crucified as the only hope of the world. I believe that it is by "the foolishness of preaching" that souls are to be saved, and that the preaching of the Cross is the power of God to those that are saved. We have services every Sunday evening at our church. The subjects have been, recently, "The Public Schools," "Criminals in Prison and Out." We have prelates on newspapers, bicycle riders, and kindred subjects. For the last six months there has been no addition on confession, and I think there have been a dozen by letter. I do not know that there have been any conversions. "God has made us for himself and the soul is restless until it finds rest in him," and that rest is only attained by a knowledge of Christ, who came to reveal the Father.

Ballard, Wash. Services held morning and evening, but I do not think it can be called Gospel. No conversions in a year. I think Mr. Moody has voiced the sentiments of many hungry souls. Oh, that there were more true heralds of the cross of Jesus-Christ! I attended a number of the churches

Mr. Moody's recent assertion during the Cooper Union revival meetings that the Church that is "without Sunday evening Gospel Services is dead."

FAITH.

FAITH is the door to heaven,
And 'tis the only one.
The soul is cleansed, the sins forgiven
Through faith in God's dear son.

By faith we walk below.
And rise o'er trials here.

'Tis faith that conquers every foe,
And scatters doubt and fear.

'Tis faith that guides our feet
When paths are dark and rough.

True faith can never know defeat,
It counts God's word enough.

Fresh strength it will impart
Through all our coming years.

In sorrow, it will cheer the heart,
And wipe away the tears.

The blessed gift of faith
First cometh from the Lord.

It is believing what he saith,
Depending on his word.

Faith, like an anchor strong,
Will hold the soul secure.

It ever sings the trusting song
That what God says is sure.

SINGERS WHO SAVE SOULS.

America's Famous Gospel Vocalists, whose Grand Voices Touch the Hearts of the Multitudes and Awaken the Sinner.

WHAT triumphs have been won for Christ by the human voice, lifted up, and thrilling with the burning ardor of consecration! What vast assemblies have been moved, what multitudes melted under the potent influence of divine song! In this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we devote space to the presentation of the portraits of some of these sweet singers—Gospel minstrels in the highest sense. From that night when the angels sang over Bethlehem's plains till now, the world has never been without tuneful voices to sing the sweet song of the Lamb. Through long persecution and darkness, the believing Church has sung its way, confident in ultimate triumph, and now in the broader Gospel light in which we are walking to-day, the strains are bolder, clearer and more resonant than ever.

In the brief biographical sketches below, we outline the careers of the Gospel singers, each history being a narrative which cannot fail to interest, instruct and encourage the reader. First among these knights of sacred song comes Ira D. Sankey, well known to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Ira David Sankey, the greatest of living Gospel singers, was born in Edenburg, Pennsylvania, in 1840. When he was sixteen years old the family removed to New-castle, in the same State. His first religious impressions came from the instructions of an old Scotch farmer, who used to take him to the Sunday School when he was only six years of age. During a series of revival meetings held in his neighborhood when he was fifteen, he was led to Christ, and on the removal of the family afterward, he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church at New-castle, identified himself with the Sunday School, and became prominent in the service of song. He trained the children of the school in singing, and conducted the service of praise in the church. His clear melodious voice, distinct enunciation of the words sung, and rich, emotional tones soon attracted attention, and he was often invited to musical circles, and to conduct the singing at public meetings and conventions.

Before he was twenty-one he was elected superintendent of the Sunday School, and it was here that he commenced his famous solo singing. His voice touches the heart, and many souls have been won by it to Christ. In 1871, at a National Y. M. C. A. Convention, at Indianapolis, Mr. Moody first heard Mr. Sankey, and was impressed with his remarkable voice and style of singing. On conferring together, they found that their love of mission work and desire for extended usefulness were mutual, and they agreed to labor together in evangelistic services. Since that time their careers have been closely identified, and they have labored together in all parts of the globe. Mr. Sankey has repeatedly accompanied Mr. Moody to Great Britain, and they have worked jointly for souls during a period of nearly twenty-five years, conducting successful revivals in many American and European cities, and everywhere being blessed by an abundant spiritual harvest. Besides his magnificent gift of song, Mr. Sankey is an excellent and effective speaker, and is also a popular composer of Gospel hymns, many of his melodies having been composed expressly for hymns written by Fanny J. Crosby, the famous blind poet. His latest book is "Sacred Songs No. 1."

For the last three months, Mr. Sankey has been assisting Mr. Moody in the conduct of the great series of revival ser-at Cooper Union and Carnegie Hall, New York—a movement which spread to many cities and to churches of every Christian denomination in the Eastern and Middle States, and which resulted in a multitude of conversions. Mr. Sankey and his wife will soon leave for Southern California, where they will spend two or three months.

Wm. J. Kirkpatrick was born in Pennsylvania, in 1838. He came of a musical family, and at an early age became quite proficient on the flute, fife, violin, and violoncello. When sixteen years old, he left his home in Duncannon, Pa., for Philadelphia, and served three years as an apprentice to a carpenter, his evenings being spent in the study and practice of music. In February, 1855, he joined the Wharton Street M. E. Church, Philadelphia, and from that time devoted himself mostly to sacred music, giving his services to the choir and Sunday School. He studied singing under Prof. T. Bishop, a leading oratorio and ballad singer, and became a member of the Harmonia and the Handel and Haydn Sacred Music Societies.

From 1854 to 1857 he composed many hymn-tunes and elaborate anthems. His first published composition was, "When the Spark of Life is Waning," which appeared between 1856 and 1859. In 1865, he superintended the publication of a tune-book, the "Heart and Voice" or "Songs of Praise for the Sanctuary," which included all the hymns of the Methodist Episcopal hymn-book. During the next year or two, some of his well-known hymns were written. The words and music of "Resting at the Cross," "Sweetly I'm Resting in Jesus," "Beautiful Day," and the music of "Remember Jesus Leads," and others, which were issued in leaflet form in 1873 and 1874, and were published in 1875 with several other pieces.

About this time Mr. Kirkpatrick became acquainted with Mr. John R. Sweney, and in 1880, his first book as an associate of Mr.

Sweney, the "Quiver of Sacred Song," was published. Since then the two have been working much together. Their summers are busy with camp-meeting work. Mr. Kirkpatrick is much occupied in helping other music writers all over the country in harmonizing and perfecting their work. Among the best known books of which he is associate editor is, "Finest of the Wheat," Nos. 1 and 2, etc.

Among the most popular of our Gospel hymn and tune writers is James McGranahan. He was born at Adamsville, Pa., in 1840 and while yet a lad, learned to read notes and sing alto in the singing schools. At nineteen, he organized his first singing class. He maintained his studies in vocal music, and under the training of Bassini, sang his first important tenor solo in the oratorio of "Stabat Mater." In 1862, after Mr. McGranahan's marriage, he became associated with the late J. G. Towner, and for some two years held conventions and concerts through central Pennsylvania and southern New York. He studied at different times under Bassini, Webb, O'Neil, and others, and the art of teaching under that prince of teachers, Dr. Geo. F. Root, the art of conducting under Zerrahn, and harmony under Dr. Mason, J. C. D. Parker, F. W. Root, and others, until the summer of 1875, when he accepted the management of the "National Normal Musical Institute." His work in musical compositions began in 1865. His first melody was entitled "My Sewing Machine." Others followed, among them were "Nearer Home," "Say a Kind Word," and "That will be Heaven for Me." For many years he has been busy writing anthems, glee and hymn tunes, which have been sung everywhere. His books are widely used both North and South. In 1877 he devoted himself to the work of singing the Gospel, and together with Major Whittle, labored faithfully and successfully for about three years. In 1880 he went to England, where he met with great success. While there he published two books: "Songs of the Gospel" and "The Gospel Male Chorus Book." He has also published a number of successful books of Gospel song in the United States. He resides at Kinsman, O., and is still in the height of his powers and popularity. Among his principal publications are: "The Choice," and "Harvest of Song;" "The Gospel Male Choir;" "The Gospel Male Choir, No. 2;" "Gospel Choir," with Mr. Sankey; "Gospel Hymns, Nos. 3, 4, 5 and 6," with Messrs. Sankey and Stebbins; "Songs of the Gospel," and "The Male Chorus Book."

Another grand singer of the Gospel of Jesus is George C. Stebbins. He was born in 1846 on a farm in Orleans Co., N. Y., where he lived until 1869, when he removed to Chicago to engage in the profession of music. His talent was of such a high order that he was appointed as Director of Music in the First Baptist Church, Chicago, one of the most influential churches in the West. He removed to Boston in 1874. During his residence in Chicago, he became acquainted with Mr. Moody, Major Whittle, Mr. Bliss, and Mr. Sankey, and frequently sang with the last named. In Boston he sang for a year in the church of which the late Dr. A. J. Gordon was pastor, and he afterward went to Tremont Temple, where he became Musical Director. He was, however, induced by Mr.

Moody to engage in evangelistic work under his direction, which he did in August, 1876. Mr. Stebbins' first singing of his song "Eternity," before the great audience of eight thousand people at Chicago made a profound impression. He has been more or less directly associated with Moody and Sankey in their work ever since, going three times abroad and twice to the Pacific Coast to assist them. He is also associate editor with Mr. Sankey and Mr. McGranahan of the books known as "Gospel Hymns," many thousands of which have been sent as premiums to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Before beginning his musical career, Mr. Stebbins married the daughter of Rev. Moses Miller, residing in the immediate neighborhood of his birthplace. On his entering the evangelistic field, she took up the work of singing with him, becoming a valuable aid, and she rendered effective service in the conduct of ladies' meetings in giving Bible-readings, and assisting in the inquiry meetings.

Wherever the voice of man is lifted in praise to its maker and wherever the story of Jesus is sung by the musical lips of childhood, the name of John Robson Sweney is known and esteemed. He has composed many sacred songs that have been a help and an inspiration to men and women in all stages of the Christian life. Perhaps the most famous of his compositions is "Beulah Land," which is now sung in almost every language under the sun. Mr. Sweney was born in West Chester, Pa., Dec. 31, 1837. At the age of nineteen he began the study of music under Professor Theodore Bauer, a celebrated German teacher, and was trained in vocal culture by Professor Barilli, the teacher of Patti. At twenty-two Mr. Sweney taught at Dover, Del. When the war opened he took charge of the band of the Third Delaware Regiment, continuing with it until disbanded by the Government. In 1869 he was recalled to the Pennsylvania Military College where, in 1876, he received the degree of Bachelor of Music, and in 1886 the degree of Doctor of Music was conferred upon him. From 1871 to the present time he has been intimately connected with church and Sunday school work for which a large number of his popular hymns have been written. To enumerate composition so well known as those of Dr. Sweney would be a work of supererogation as they are sung in almost every Christian household.

Mr. E. O. Excell was born in Marlborough, O., in 1852, his father being a minister of the German Reformed Church. He was apprenticed to a trade, but being gifted with a wonderful baritone voice, turned his attention to its cultivation. He was for six years a pupil under Dr. Geo. Root, the famous professor of music at the National Normal School, and while still very young, was heard in public before large audiences with great appreciation. His powerful and sympathetic voice possesses a wonderful charm and never fails to move those who hear it in sacred song. Mr. Excell was converted in his twelfth year, when he, with his wife, was attending a revival at East Broad, O. He has during the subsequent years done noble Gospel service, and has not only sung at great revivals in the United States, Canada, and Great Britain, but at Chattanooga Assemblies, and numerous concerts and conventions. In 1885 he was Musical Director at the International Sunday School Convention in Louisville, Ky. For a number of years he has been engaged in the publishing of church and Sunday school music in Chicago, and has been prominent in all religious work in the city and State. He is an author as well as singer, and some of his compositions are widely popular, one of the best known being the famous hymn, "We stand before the King." He is now in his best age for active Gospel work.

One of the best known composers of sacred song is Hul Platt Main, who was born at Ridgefield, Conn., in 1839. His father was an old-fashioned singing school teacher with a capital voice, the young lad brought up in a musical atmosphere. After leaving school and engaging in different business ventures, he at last settled down to the profession for which he seemed to be naturally adapted. In 1855, began as a composer of music, and assisted his father to edit "The Sunday School Lyric" and the first Methodist Hymn Tune Book of 1856, and was the associate of Wood & Bradbury in producing many compilations from 1856 to the time of his death; and in 1866, he assisted Phillips in "The M. E. Church Hymn Tune-Book," "Singing Pilgrim," etc. Since that time his entire energies have been devoted to the production of original sacred composition, and the editing, compiling of a very large number of Sunday School hymn-books, volumes of anthems, Hymn and Tune-Books for the use of choirs, etc. He has been member of several choral organizations in New York and Newark, and has ranked among his friends most of the famous musical celebrities, home and foreign, who have appeared in this country. He is a practical composer, gifted with skill, originality and rare versatility, and since the date of his first original production in 1855, not a thousand compositions have come from his pen, including part songs, school pieces, Sunday School songs, anthems, instrumental songs, and a few instrumental pieces. Among his most popular productions are: "We shall Meet Beyond the River," 1867; "The Bright Forever," 1871; "In the Fadeless Spring-time," 1872; "Blessed Homeland," 1877; "O, how I Love," 1872. Mr. Main is somewhat of an antiquarian in musical matters, and has collected of genuine musical antiquities makes a small library of itself, recognized as probably the best authority in America on hymnology.

John H. Burke is one of the comparatively new men in Gospel song, as American audiences are concerned. He was born in Ireland in 1855 and came to this country with his parents, settled in Chicago. The family attended

INDIA'S DYING PEOPLE.

The Famine Increasing in Virulence and the Missionaries Urgently Appealing for Help—The Plague in Bombay Slaying its Thousands.

EVERY cable dispatch from India adds heart-rending details to the sad accounts of suffering previously sent. The Government no longer conceals the fact that the famine is greater than it had foreseen, and that multitudes are dying of starvation whom it has not the power to relieve. Private benevolence is coming to its aid with liberal subscriptions, but every comparatively flourishing condition of the cities.

"A curious thing is that the greatest number of deaths from starvation occur in the most fertile districts. Now let us trace back the cause of the fearful mortality. A trade union system two or three thousand years old prevails in the villages of India. The centre of every model village is the country, writes: "Distress is creeping on all around us. There have been some slight showers in some parts of the Talug, and the millet in the villages close to the Godavery may yield a half crop, but in the Koi villages all is gone. The severe distress will begin in a few weeks. At present many have some grain, and they are digging roots everywhere.

"It is quite plain that famine, or at least severe distress, mitigated only by the exertions of the Government and of private individuals, has commenced on an immense scale in Northern and Central India. Very many millions of people are involved in the calamity. The Government is putting forth all its strength to bring food, and the means of purchasing it within the reach of the people, and is pledged to spare no expenditure or effort to save life. But the task is prodigious. The official estimate in November was that in the Northwest Provinces alone a failure of crops in a greater or less degree had taken place in an area with a population of 40,000,000 of people. Then there are parts of the Punjab, Central India, Bombay, and Madras, similarly affected besides.

"A certain amount of private money has been subscribed. But at a time like this, when so many millions of people in India are involved in such dire distress, Christians ought not to withhold help. Vast as the Government organization is, how is it possible for it to reach the homes of such multitudes, and deal the bread to the women, the children, the sick and the weakly, who cannot go to the relief works?"

The gratitude of the writer of the foregoing letter is expressed in eloquent terms to the friend to whom the letter was written for a few pounds which he had sent by telegraph which enabled him to save the lives of some of the people who were begging for help. The missionaries long to give at least some food to the people to whom they have preached the Gospel, that the sufferers may know that the compassion of Christ lives in his followers and that for his dear sake they gladly feed the starving. How much the cause of Christianity might be advanced in India, it is impossible to conceive if in this supreme crisis the missionary had in his hands the means of saving the people around him from perishing of starvation. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be glad to forward any sums sent for the purpose.

The proverb that calamities never come singly is being fulfilled in India's sad experience. The cable brings the news that the horrible pestilence known as "the Black Death," has broken out and is slaying its thousands. An American merchant in Bombay, which is the scene of its early ravages, says that the cause is generally attributed to the people who are unable to procure whole some food, eating damaged and unsaleable grain to appease the pangs of hunger. "Its victims are," he says, "for the greater part among the poor and ill-fed who live in the high, badly ventilated houses of the unclean grain quarter. Its course is horribly swift. A headache, bubbles forming on the groins or sides of the upper body or anywhere where there are glands, and then death. The whole thing is usually run through in forty-eight hours." A Bombay correspondent of the New York Herald writes: "In Poona and Bandra the plague is raging with great virulence. The efforts of physicians to stay the progress of the disease in the slightest degree have been fruitless and the death rate has become extremely high. Hundreds of persons attacked by the disease have died in two or three hours, after suffering dreadful agony. Every day the situation becomes worse and it is estimated that nearly half the population of the city have fled to escape death. The misery is greatly aggravated by the prevalence of the famine, thousands of the natives who leave the city have absolutely nothing on which to support themselves in the country, and thus fall victims to the slower death from starvation. The streets and bazaars that a few weeks ago were teeming with life are now virtually deserted, and many shops are closed." The fugitives will carry the seeds of the plague with them.

dollar is needed, and every day's delay in expending it is costing thousands of lives. The correspondent of the New York Sun cables: "The response to the appeal, liberal as it is, is utterly inadequate to stem the tide of suffering. It will require the generosity of the whole world to oppose a real check to the ravages of hunger in India. It would be easy to harrow the hearts of every one possessing a spark of human sympathy by the accounts of the typical sights and experiences in the vast famine districts during the past few weeks. It is sufficient to say that the grim, starving millions of India are perishing at a more rapid rate than any army ever suffered before the most deadly engines of destruction devised by man." Another American correspondent reports that the Government has now three million men employed on the relief works, but that at least eighty-one millions are suffering the pangs of hunger. The collapse seems to have come simultaneously in the homes of the people where, at the best of times, there is little or no reserve on which to fall back. With the sad patience of the Oriental, want has been endured, the daily supply of food has been diminished until like a walking skeleton the poor native has become frenzied with hunger and pleads piteously for any fragment of food that will assuage his pain.

In a recently published interview with Commissioner Booth-Tucker of the Salvation Army, who was born in India and passed the greater part of his life in that land, he explained the cause of the periodical famines which afflict the country and of which this is the most severe of recent times. He said: "The population of India is almost entirely agricultural, that is, about eleven of every twelve of the people live in villages or country towns, and are dependent upon the land for their support. It is in these villages that the chronic wart exists, and that the pressure of famine is most keenly felt. In the towns wages are higher, employment is more easily obtained, and the charity of rich natives obviates any serious amount of suffering. Hence, also, the existence and extent of the chronic suffering come to be doubted, as it is judged largely from the pied by the land owners. It is divided into five sections. One is occupied by the cultivators of the land, another by the weavers, another by the tanners, the fourth by the potters who make the cooking and eating vessels, and the last by the sweepers or scavengers. The system is such that every man, woman and child is taught to follow some profession, or, rather, occupation, and to assist at the harvests. From time to time there are two harvests, again, three, in a year. No matter what these people do, they are paid in food, that is, grain. Every morning at four o'clock the housewives in the villages get up, and you can hear them grinding the day's supply of corn. They throw a little of the flour into a bowl of watered buttermilk and make a food called gheens. The supply is always scant, for the housewife knows that if no rain falls, she and her family will not have enough grain to carry them over to the next harvest. So it is always stint, stint with the family, and when it isn't stint it is starve."

The testimonies from the scene of the calamity confirm the Commissioner's view. One missionary writes: "I got in last night from a week's hard traveling in the famine district of Behar and Khandesh. We have taken in eighty children. They have to be fitted up with clothes, bedding, and everything. Grain is so dear and extra food is required. Will you ask prayer for us? We need it in so many ways. Who will help to feed this large family?" Another who has his home in the Koi Moody's church in that city, and in the church young Burke made his profession of the Christian faith. His first experience in public singing was as musical leader of the Sunday School, and after that he began an active musical and evangelistic career. In 1880 he married Miss Margaret McDonald, a member of Mr. Moody's church. Since adopting music as a profession he has led choirs at many conventions and large religious assemblies in different parts of the country. He has been a laborer in many missions, with D. L. Moody, Major Whittle, Rev. B. Fay Mills, and Rev. John McNeill, evangelists whose names and work are known in all English-speaking lands. Quite recently he assisted Messrs. Moody and Sankey in their great revival services at Cooper Union and Carnegie Hall, New York City.

Peter Emilio Bilhorn belongs to the younger generation of Gospel singers, having been born at Mendota, Ill., in 1872, of German parents. His father possessed a magnificent voice, and was also a composer, so it was not surprising that the son should inherit musical talent. He was converted during a series of Revival Meetings under Mr. Moody's charge, and decided to consecrate his life to Christian work. This was in 1891, and since that time Mr. Bilhorn has been a most active and successful worker for Christ. He has sung at Gospel services and revival meetings in almost every important city in the country, and has been associated with many leading evangelists. He has sung to the cowboys, to the Indians of the Black Hills, to the traders at the outposts in remote sections of the newer States and Territories and to immense audiences in the Eastern and Middle States. His superb vocalism has the means of attracting multitudes wherever he has appeared. On one occasion, while singing at a revival meeting held in the streets of Bismark, North Dakota, he found himself surrounded by a rough-looking audience of cowboys, who were evidently bent on mischief. The vocalist had taken his seat on a wooden bench, and with his little portable organ in front began his song of salvation. He had received permission from the Mayor of the town to hold meetings, and that official had warned him that they might be attended with danger. When he looked around him at those grim faces, shaded by a wide sombrero, he remembered the Mayor's warning. At the close of his hymn his uncouth audience expressed their approval by firing off their revolvers in the air. This sort of applause was not at all encouraging, but it is an illustration of what may be expected in some out-of-the-way localities where Christian work is to be done. After a short course of study at Mr. Moody's School at Northfield, Mass., Mr. Bilhorn went to Brooklyn, where he labored with Rev. Geo. F. Pentecost and other evangelists. He is the author of a number of very popular Gospel Hymn sections, including "Crowning Glory," "Sunshine Songs," etc. Mr. Bilhorn's music is sung all over the Christian world to-day. Among his most popular songs are "Did He Come In," "Thou art singing," "Jesus Saves me To-day," "It Well with Your Soul," etc. He was married on June 13th, 1894, to Miss Elsie M. McCaughina, of Byron, Mich., and accompanies him everywhere in his evangelistic work.

O. B. Towner was born in Rome, Pa., in 1850, and was of a musical taste from childhood. About 1885 the call of God to enter His service could not be mistaken. Towner felt it to be his duty to give himself wholly to evangelistic work. He moved to Northfield, Mass., and took charge of the music in the annual College Conference, and aided Mr. Moody in his important services. Since then he has been associated with Dr. L. W. Munroe, Rev. B. Fay Mills, Major Whittle, and other well-known evangelists, who place a high value on his services. He acknowledges the valuable aid he has derived from them. Mr. Towner's heart is in Gospel service, and it is his delight to move from seat to seat in the "quirers' meeting," directing individual souls to Christ. Towner is truly a help-meet for her husband. She possesses a wonderful natural musical taste, and in accompanying him on the organ and joining her voice to his contributes to the sweetness and power of the service.

Our portraits of the Gospel singers in this issue are from photographs procured especially for the purpose of this publication.

An Immediate Duty.

WORD comes from Washington that the Arbitration Treaty is in peril, and may fail, through the assaults and misrepresentations of those who are the enemies of international peace. This must not be. It is the immediate and imperative duty of every Christian man and woman in the land to do all that lies within their power to secure the passage of the Treaty by the Senate.

That Treaty represents the mightiest, grandest movement ever begun for driving brutal war out of the earth. The men who, on either side of the sea, did most to effect that plan of arbitration, have made themselves immortal. The evening of the present administration of the United States Government has been honored with the gladdest event of eighteen centuries. All civilized nations will copy the sublime example. Our illustrious Senate must be made to understand how the nation regards the Treaty, and the members of that august body should allow nothing to interfere with a vote of ratification, that the bells of all Christendom may ring out "Peace on earth, good will to men." By emphatic and enthusiastic vote, let the Senate rise to the splendor of the occasion and win the favor of all the good on earth and all the mighty in heaven. Let the Aye! Aye! of our American Senate resound through all the Capitals of Europe, and make all the arsenals and armories of the round world hear that there shall be no more murder among nations.

In order that this hope may be realized, and in the interest of "Peace and good will to men," THE CHRISTIAN HERALD asks its readers everywhere to write to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, urging the approval of the Treaty. Address your letters

HON. JOHN SHERMAN,
United States Senate,
WASHINGTON, D. C.

Write briefly, clearly, pointedly, and at once. It is a duty every one owes to his country, to mankind and to Christ, to take a stand now and help along the age of universal Peace in this too long war-stricken world.

Who to Help.

GOD does not give us a special call to look after suffering of which we are ignorant, but when through philanthropic act a case of hardship is revealed to us, then we have a special call from God to care for that particular case. If we have not adequate means to help, the very desire to do so is an enlargement of one's better nature, and the prayer we offer for the sufferer's rescue will be as acceptable as a donation of hard cash. But the prayer will amount to nothing if we have the means and make no response. The Lord will in substance say: "Why do you call on me to do that which you can do yourself?" "God bless you," are often very cheap and meaningless, but prayer and effort combined in the same cause make the human and the Divine auxiliary.

It is a matter of congratulation that the newspapers of the country are becoming the custodians of relief funds. They sweep so wide a field that when they lift a distress flag over an Armenian massacre, or a Constantinople earthquake, or a Russian famine, or start a Noah's ark of help across a Western deluge, or point down to a home under great stress of circumstances, they challenge widest attention and call up immediate relief. Gradually all the agencies of intelligence and power will become agencies of mercy, an temporal relief and spiritual relief will go together, as Christ first gave bread to the hungry and then preached his sermon. An empty stomach always means an unappreciative auditor. I exult in the fact that the Gospel of Christ is yet to lift all burdens and make all crooked things straight and put girdle of Edenic beauty and luxuriance all round the earth. The last woe of this dispensation of distress, will end in a doxology of a new dispensation of prosperity.

Can Afford to Wait.

SOMETIMES in life it is necessary to make a retort; sometimes it is necessary to resist, but there are crises when the most triumphant thing to do is to keep silence. The philosopher, confident in his newly-discovered principle, waiting for the coming of more intelligent generations, willing that men should laugh at the lightning-rod and cotton-gin and steamboat—waiting long years through the scoffing of philosophical schools, in grand and magnificent silence, Galileo, condemned by mathematicians and monks; caricatured everywhere, yet waiting and watching with his telescope to see the coming-out of stellar reinforcements, when the stars in their courses would fight for the Copernican system; then sitting down in complete blindness and deafness to wait for the coming of the generations who would build his monument and bow at his grave. The reformer, execrated by his contemporaries, fastened in a pillory, the slow fires of public contempt burning under him—ground under the cylinders of the printing press, yet calmly waiting for the day when purity of soul and heroism of character will get the sanction of earth, and the plaudits of heaven. Affliction, enduring without any complaint the sharpness of the pang, and the violence of the storm, and the heft of the chain, and the darkness of the night—waiting until a divine hand shall be put forth to soothe the pang, and hush the storm, and release the captive. A wife abused, persecuted and a perpetual exile from every earthly comfort—waiting, waiting, until the Lord shall gather up his dear children in a heavenly home, and no poor Vashti will ever be thrust from the palace gate.

An Arctic explorer found a ship floating helplessly about among the icebergs, and going on board he found that the captain was frozen at his logbook, and the helmsman was frozen at the wheel, and the men on the outlook were frozen in their places. That was awful, but magnificent. All the Arctic blasts and all the icebergs could not drive them from their duty. Their silence was louder than thunder. And this old ship of a world has many at their posts in the awful chill of neglect, and frozen of the world's scorn; and their silence shall be the eulogy of the skies; and be rewarded long after this weather-beaten craft of a planet shall have made its last voyage.

A WONDERFUL NUMBER.

SOMETIMES it is good to let questions full of mysticism enter into our thoughts; and there are few subjects of this kind more strongly occult than the power and influence given to the number seven, for it enters into both human and celestial affairs in a way beyond our understanding, and reverently, and without curiosity, we may ponder what truth is represented in this fascinating division.

If we go back to the earliest religions and literatures, we find them full of seven; the Indian, Persian, and Arabian theologies having all their great truths hung upon this number, while their sacred books are "sevened" as highly as our own Bible. Brahmanism has seven incarnations of the deity; seven heavens (St. Paul also speaks of being caught up into the seventh heaven), seven hells, and seven regions governed by seven kings subordinate to Indra, Lord of All. The sacred books of Zoroaster are still more remarkable for the prominence given to the number seven; and the Persian dictionary of to-day contains above one hundred groups of objects designated as seven so-and-so. As to Arabic religion and literature, we need only recall the charming "Thousand and One Nights," or any ordinary translation of the Koran to see how marvelously it is sevened. Later on, Homer, Pythagoras, Plato, and other Grecian philosophers give to this number a still greater prominence; but it will interest us more to observe its influence in that Holy Book, which is to our spiritual and moral condition all that the sun is to health and vegetation.

In the Holy Scriptures seven meets us at the Creation, in the institution of the Sabbath. It is the ordering numeral of the Deluge. It measures Jacob's days of servitude. It determines the time of Egypt's plenty and famine. It is the sum of the nations driven out of Canaan to make room for Jacob's descendants; and in the siege of Jericho it plays a part which cannot be accidental. The lives of Samson, Elijah, Elisha, and the prophets furnish many remarkable examples.

Not only in history and prophecy is it prominent, it takes an authoritative place in religious observances. The number of victims, the sprinkling of blood, and the divisions of sacred times are determined by this number; thus, the seventh day was the Sabbath; the seventh week brought Pentecost, separated from the Passover by a week of weeks. The seventh month brought the Feast of Tabernacles and the great Day of Atonement; while a week of years terminated in the Sabbatical year, and after seven weeks of years came the great jubilee of the fiftieth year.

Morally it has in the Bible as great a prominence as it has in its history, prophecy, and ritualism. The Lord declares a seven-fold vengeance on whoever shall slay Cain. Lamech calls for a seventy-and-seven-fold punishment. In Leviticus 26:24, the disobedient are threatened by God with a punishment of seven times. The Psalms are full of this number as a noun of multitude specifying the perfection of God's Word, the trials of the righteous and their final triumph. A very remarkable instance of this moral use of seven is found in Peter's inquiry of Christ, as to the number of times he should forgive his enemies.

The passing away of the Mosaic ritual did not abrogate the significance of seven, on the contrary, it received a seven-fold importance in that book which seals the New Testament. Revelation opens with the vision of the seven churches and the seven angels, and the splendor, and wonder, and majesty of its succeeding visions are not lessened but increased by the strange prominence given to this numeral. Without difficulty any Bible-reader will recall the seven candlesticks, seven stars, seven seals, seven heads, seven crowns, seven horns, seven eyes, seven kings, seven vials, seven plagues, etc., etc.

There may be added to its religious significance a very certain astronomical and physiological influence, and it is sure that nature herself in her movements and operations decidedly observes this number. Secular literature, also, has been sevened as remarkably as sacred writings, and there is hardly a book which has left its mark upon any age in which it does not appear. Shakespeare alone would furnish more examples than we should care to commit to memory. Still more curious is the odd certainty with which it allies itself with national and even with individual crises. Many now living can remember years in which seven occurred as years of great suffering, financial trouble, or bloody strife; the terrible battle around the desolate "Seven Pines," and the "Seven days' light before Richmond," being examples which could be indefinitely multiplied.

Now there must be some deep, underlying truth in this singular, persistent, universal influence, and there is nothing irreverent in considering what it may be. The learned and pious German divines, Bahr and Kurt, think the number to be symbolical, composed of two other symbolical numbers, three and four; three, representing the Trinity of Godhead; four, the whole created universe, which is determined in position by the four points of the compass. Thus, if three represent Divinity, and four, humanity, seven is that union of both, which is the hope and aim of all religions.

BRIEF NOTES.

A Cable Dispatch to the New York Journals announces that in compliance with the earnest appeals of his London church, Dr. George F. Pente-coat has declined the call to the pastorate at Yonkers, N. Y.

The project of a Temperance hospital to be erected by the W. C. T. U. is taking shape. It is to be in Chicago, and the promoters hope to prove by practical demonstration to the medical profession that there is no need to administer alcohol in any case to save a patient's life.

Dr. F. E. Clark, President of the Society of Christian Endeavor, writes that he has secured for use as a gavel at the next International Convention the shoemaker's hammer that was used by William Carey before he went as a missionary to India. It is the gift of an enthusiastic English Endeavorer.

The Christian Endeavorers of Iowa who have labored much among prisoners, are turning their attention to helping them when they are a liberty. They are also taking up Mr. Moody's suggestion of putting Bibles, the Colportage Library and other books and papers in each county jail.

Marshall, Tex., has been Deeply Stirred by the services held there by Evangelist Chelpepper. Over seven hundred persons have declared themselves on the Lord's side. The M. C. A., which was almost moribund, revived and has called a general secretary. The churches have been quickened.

The Congregationalist says that one blessed result of a revival in the Golden State is the healing of a contention between two denominations. Today, as of old, no clearer witness to the presence of the Holy Spirit can be found than is expressed in these words: "Behold, how these brethren love one another."

Bishop Hartzell who succeeded Bishop William Taylor as missionary Bishop of Africa, writes that he has recovered from the surgical operation undergone in London, and that he and his family have sailed for Monrovia, Liberia. After attending conference there he will proceed inland to visit the Mission Stations.

A convict in the Indiana State Prison who has been converted in the services held in the prison by the Christian Endeavor Society said: "I am the same care and interest been manifested in me behalf in bygone years, that Brother Curry at our prison Christian Endeavor Society now affords me, I will never have been a convict."

Evangelist Arthur Crane writes us that he has had a successful series of services at Johnsonburg, Pa. The meetings were held in the hall as none of the churches was large enough to hold the crowds. There were many conversions, and the churches are receiving additions. Mr. Crane now goes to Parkersburg, W. Va.

The American Missionary Association annual report discloses that the association has about fifty normal schools in successful operation in the Southern States, devoted solely to the preparation of colored teachers among their own people. Up to the present time this association has expended about $11,000,000 in the South and has educated 10,000 colored teachers.

The Presbyterian Chapters of the Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip will hold their biennial convention on Jan. 29-31, in the South Presbyterian Church, Newark, N. J. The Brotherhood has now nearly five hundred chapters connected with various denominations, and has done much through fraternal appeals and individual efforts to win souls for Christ.

Miss Jessie A. Ackerman, the W. C. T. U. missionary who has spent eight years in visiting missionary lands, writes: "The missionaries never fail to reach the thinking men and women heathen lands until the liquor traffic is overthrown in America and the opium traffic in England, in foreigners can see the principles of Christianity exemplified in our governments."

Mr. Moody is much gratified with the results of the movement so far in Boston, and as yet there are no signs of any set-back. Tremont Temple has been crowded every afternoon, and there have been but few seats vacant at any of the morning meetings. Many of the attendants have given evidence of conversion or re-consecration. The choir, led Prof. Burke, has been of great service in leading the singing.

San Francisco fully expects to entertain the Christian Endeavor Convention this year. The buildings, with a capacity for seventeen thousand, have been secured, and choruses are forming in different cities in California. The number of members on the different committees varies from 100 for the transportation committee to nine hundred for the reception committee. The Trans-Pacific Steamship Company has offered a special round trip rate for the benefit of missionaries in China and Japan.

Dr. L. W. Munhall's meetings for men at the Opera House, Ottawa, Canada, Ont., were a scene to be remembered. Long before the hour pointed the street was crowded with men, most of them young, apparently intelligent clerks and chanciers. Dr. Munhall was evidently deeply moved by the presence of so large and interesting an audience. He gave a plain, earnest Gospel talk, and the close over one hundred and fifty men rose, declared their acceptance of Christ as their Savior. In the evening the Union service was held in Dominion Church which was crowded to the doors.

A tribute to American missionaries. Turkey is paid by Mr. James Bryce, an ex-minister and a member of the British Parliament in his work on Armenia. He writes: "I cannot mention the American missionaries without a tribute to the admirable work they have done. They have had the only good influence that has worked abroad upon the Turkish Empire. They have cheerfully in the midst, not only of hardships, but of the most serious dangers also. They have been the first to bring the light of education and learning into these dark places."

An illustration of missionary progress given in "Woman's Work for Woman." It is that four years ago services were commenced at San Ning, Canton province, China, in a dark room on an obscure street. A superior church building was dedicated there last September, one hundred and eighty men and women joining in the song of praise. The building includes a chapel, one hundred and twenty-five feet, a social hall and a school room. The cost was over $5,000, of which all but $100 from a gentleman in California, was contributed by Chinese.

Rice Trouble in Alaska.

COMPLAINTS of the condition of affairs in Alaska have been made in Russia. The New York Herald's correspondent in St. Petersburg cables that the Russians in Alaska are discontented, and have made formal allegations against the American authorities. The Russians in Alaska assert that they suffer all kinds of tedious and oppressive restrictions and are prevented exercising their rights. Two specimen cases are cited. One was that a Russian school-teacher who refused to give his lessons in English, was warned to leave his school, otherwise it would be burned. The second case is that of a service in a Russian church at some place named, being interrupted by a band of armed men who insisted that the congregation go out to work instead of attending to their religious duties. The Russians make the general charge that the traders control Alaska and that the United States Government does not exert its authority to keep them from debauching the natives and oppressing the handful of Russians who remain in the Territory. Doubtless these charges will be fully investigated by the Washington Government and there is no doubt that they will be disproved, although it is possible that they may have been isolated cases of difficulties arising between American and Russian traders. Russia knows of old the difficulties of which it complains. In fact, the United States would probably have never gained possession of Alaska at all, but for such difficulties. From 1745, when Novikoff first pushed his adventurous shallop from the shore of Kuskatka through the ice to Alaska, down to 1867, when the Russian Government finally sold the territory to Mr. Seward for $7,200,000, the Government waged a ceaseless contest with the trading companies and never succeeded in making them fulfil the terms of their contracts. Prior to 1867, the trading companies had sixty in number, quarrelled among themselves, each oppressing the natives and disposing over their rich booty; and in that year the companies amalgamated under the name of the Russian American Company and secured a charter from the Emperor Paul, giving exclusive rights on condition of performing certain duties. These duties it never fully performed and when its charter expired in 1844, the Russian Government refused to renew it. A company of American merchants was then formed, who endeavored to secure the lapsed charter by the payment of five million dollars in cash for a twenty years' lease of the territory, but Mr. Seward's offer brought the vast region to the possession of the United States in perpetuity. As the Russian traders did not fulfil their obligations to their own Government when Alaska belonged to Russia, it is not surprising that there is trouble now that they are under our Government. The difficulty with them will probably be found to be much as it is with other people, that they are concerned about their rights and neglect their duties. God makes the same complaint against his people:

their way is not equal . . . when the wicked, with his wickedness and doeth that which is evil and right, he shall live thereby. (Ezek. 17-19.)

Insidious Drug.
A press dispatch from a Connecticut town reports an alarming development of a seductive drug. It appears that some months ago, one of the citizens who was suffering from a catarrhal affection, consulted a physician of Hartford, Conn., who prescribed a medicine, the chief ingredient of which was cocaine. The effect was almost magical. Relief of all the pain and distress of the mucous membranes of the throat and nose was almost instantaneous. The drug also affected the spirits. It stimulated the action of the brain, the nerves, and the heart, producing an elation and vivacity the patient had never experienced before. It was very pleasant as long as the effects continued and the patient persisted in taking the medicine for their sake, long after the disease for which he began taking it had disappeared. He gave some of it to his friends, who experienced the same tonic effects from it. One told another of it and introduced it to other circles until its use has become a habit through the town. The dispatch says that men, women, and young people of both sexes have become addicted to its use and are unable to abandon it. A specialist in narcotics, says that the sufferings of an habitue of cocaine, who tries to give it up, are far worse than that of a drunkard, or a morphine habitue, who is striving after emancipation. Yet the effort is necessary if the habitue is to be saved from physical and mental collapse. Its effects when taken in excess, or for a long time, are positively enslaving. The victim suffers from insomnia, terrible de-food and supplies of all kinds, sufficient to last for several years, will be established. Peary will wait there until a propitious season for a farther advance across the ice. He says that in the best seasons it will be difficult, but in some seasons it would be altogether impossible. When the proper time arrives, he will set out with one, or at most two, white companions and with some Esquimaux, whose experience would be valuable, and try to travel over the ice with dogs and sledges, to the Pole. The remainder of the party would stay with the supplies at the station to await his return. The object of this arrangement, of course, is to avoid carrying a heavy load of food and equipment over the ice in the last stage of the journey. The Lieutenant is sanguine of success, and believes that he will win the proud distinction of placing the Stars and Stripes over the spot which explorers of so many nations have vainly tried to reach. His prospects of success are greater than any who have gone before him, because he has learned how to live in the climate. He spent several seasons among the Esquimaux, living in their huts, sharing their food and joining them in their pursuits. In which is almost two miles long. The men turned out into one of the passages which, as they supposed, led to a gallery in which one of them used to work. But this was a mistake; it led to a part of the mine with which they were unacquainted, and when they turned back they missed their way. Their terror was extreme. They ran hither and thither frantically trying to find a passage that led to the main section, but always failing. Their lights went out at the end of twenty-four hours, and they were ready to faint with weariness and hunger. At last they gave up hope and lay down side by side to die. One of them, who by this time was in a high fever and desperately thirsty, thought he heard the splash of water. He jumped up and ran in the direction the sound came from. To his delight, he found a fresh, cool spring, and called his companions to come. One of them remembered the spring, well, and had often drunk at it when he worked in the mine. He knew his way from it to his former place of work, and thence to the mouth of the mine. By the light of some matches they had in their pockets they traversed the passage, and at last came to the shaft by which they had entered. When they reached the surface they fainted from exhaustion. A passer-by saw them lying near the pit's mouth and took them in a wagon to the city hospital. It may be hoped that men whose lives have been so wonderfully saved, will be saved, too, from the sins and corruptions of this dark world. The way out of them, too, like that in the mine, is by a fountain of which the prophet wrote:

In that day there shall be a fountain opened . . . for sin and uncleanness. (Zech. 13: 1.)

Human Ashes in the River.

A strange funeral ceremony took place in St. Louis, Mo., on Jan. 3. A man bearing an urn entered the Eads Bridge over the Mississippi river. He went to the centre of the middle arch, and proceeded to empty the contents of the urn into the river. He explained that the urn had contained his father's ashes and this was the kind of funeral his father had desired. It appears that his father was a German, who had emigrated many years ago to this country. He established himself as a piano-maker and prospered. In his old age, he retired from business and went to live with his son. He was somewhat eccentric, and on many subjects held decided opinions antagonistic to the common usages and customs of society. Among others, he disliked the parade and display of the ordinary funeral, and expressed the wish that there should be nothing of the kind at his own obsequies. Finally, he decided on an observance to his mind. He demanded and received from his son a solemn promise that when he died his body should be cremated, and the ashes cast into the Mississippi from the Eads Bridge. The old man died last month, and his son kept his promise. It may be hoped that the deceased was not as eccentric as to the disposal of his soul, as he was about the disposal of his body. Even as to the soul, there are some who so live that its fate is like that of this man's body:

The ungodly are like the chaff which the wind driveth away. (Ps. 1: 4.)

pression of spirits, and finally goes mad, and generally commits suicide if he is not cured before it reaches its full power over him. The difficulty of cure is extreme, owing to the paralysis of the will-power that the victim suffers. Happily, cocaine addiction is not common anywhere except in this Connecticut town, though almost every city could furnish some examples. But there is another evil, similar in some of its effects, that is common everywhere and is still more disastrous in its consequences. Sin, like the insidious drug, is enslaving and paralyzes the will-power so that the victim suffers in giving it up, and cannot do so by his own power.

His own iniquities shall take the wicked and he shall be holden with the cords of his sin. He shall die for lack of instruction, and in the greatness of his folly he shall go astray. (Prov. 5: 22, 23.)

To Reach the Pole.

Another attempt to reach the North Pole, is to be made by Lieut. Peary as soon as the necessary funds are provided. At a recent meeting of the American Geographical Society, the Lieutenant explained his plans. He proposes to take a party to the most northerly point of the Archipelago which stretches to the north of the coast of Greenland. There a depot with that way he has learned to adapt himself to a climate which has proved fatal to so many explorers. The same principle applies to the religious life. The man who desires to go to heaven when he dies should live the heavenly life here. The promise is to those who live that life:

They that feared the Lord spake often one to another and the Lord hearkened and heard it, and a book of remembrance was written before him for them that feared the Lord, and they shall be mine saith the Lord of hosts in that day when I make up my jewels, and I will spare them, as a man spareth his own son that serveth him. (Mal. 3: 16-17.)

Lost in a Mine.

Three men who were brought into Gloucester, O., a few days ago and sent to the hospital for treatment, tell a thrilling story of danger and suffering. The story, as given in the Cincinnati Enquirer, is that they were lost for a week in the Great Diamond coal mine, whose mouth is about four miles from Gloucester. They are miners, and were employed in the Great Diamond before work was suspended there, three years ago. The men, having a holiday, agreed to go down the mine and explore their old haunts. They took the candles in their caps and descended. They reached the bottom safely and went through the main section,

Questions and Answers.

A. C. Greene, Westminster, Conn. What is the proper channel through which to send money for the Armenian Orphan Fund?

It can be sent through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which is sending money weekly to the American missionaries to aid the orphans.

Mrs. S. E. H. Rutland, Ind. 1. After the Flood ceased, how long did it take for the water to dry off the earth? 2. Who wrote the Book of Proverbs? 3. Who wrote the Acts?

1. On the seventeenth day of the seventh month (about April), or a hundred and fifty days after the Deluge began, the Ark rested on Ararat, and the waters began to abate. On the first day of the tenth month (July), the tops of the mountains were visible, and on the first day of the first month of the new year (September-October), the waters were dried from off the earth. 2. They are of composite origin and varied authorship, but all the evidence goes to show that they were collected by Solomon's orders, he being himself the author of many proverbs. The compilation, as authorities hold, was not made until four hundred years after Solomon's reign. 3. Tradition ascribes them to Luke.

New Subscriber, Spring City, Pa. Does not the injunction against being conformed to the world (Rom. 12:2) apply to fashions, such as shaving all hair from the face except the moustache, and the wearing of fashionable dress, &c?

The injunction applies to the mind, as you will see by the context of the passage you quote. The Christian must not adopt worldly principles, nor be governed by worldly motives. His life should not be conformed to the world. There is no virtue in wearing old-fashioned clothes, or in a man making himself conspicuous in any way. Extravagance in dress and eccentricity in manner should be avoided. If the world had nothing by which to recognize a Christian but his manner of shaving, the man must be living a very poor life. If he is showing Christ's spirit in loving helpfulness, in magnanimity, kindness, forbearance, charity, he is more usefully serving Christ and fulfilling his obligations than he would be by shaving, or not shaving. You remember that the Pharisees were irreproachable so far as outward appearance and observance were concerned, but Christ denounced them.

M. M. Grand Lodge, Mich. 1. Are men predestinated to be saved or lost as appears to be taught in Romans 8:29-30? 2. Does a person who has believed in Christ have eternal life here and now?

1. The question has been argued for and against for many years, without practical result. The promise that God gives us that whosoever will may come, and take of the water of life freely (Rev. 22:17), and that whosoever cometh to Christ he will in no wise cast out (John 6:37), should be sufficient for us. Supposing that there is predestination, no one can tell whether he is predestined to be saved or lost. He knows perfectly well that he can come if he will, and God will keep his promise. Or he can stay away if he chooses, and take the consequences. That is all that concerns him, and he need not try to understand the attitude of God in the matter. The promise is to all who accept the terms. 2. Christ certainly said so. (See John 1:14; 1:28, and many other similar passages.)

W. H. W. Cofer, N. C. Give a description of the flag of Italy and Spain.

Italy's flag is green, white and red vertical stripes. Spain's flag is red, white and red horizontal stripes, with a crown in the center. The flag of the United States is thirteen horizontal stripes, seven red alternating with six white, with a blue canton containing fifty small, five-pointed white stars.

W. H. W. Cofer, N. C. 1. Where was the Ark built? 2. About how long did it take to build? 3. How long did it stay on the mountain? 4. How long did it stay on the mountain?

1. It was built on Mount Ararat. 2. It took about a year to build. 3. It stayed on the mountain for about a year. 4. It stayed on the mountain for about a year.

to be used "as amulets." Hieronymus the Egyptian, Manaseas, and other writers mention the same circumstance. Nicholas of Damascus, a famous early author, also wrote of it and said that the name of the mountain was Eris.

Mrs. E. E. D. Anderson, Mo., writes as follows:

We would as soon think of doing without our daily meals as without THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is a feast from start to finish, and not an article in it but is interesting in its own way. We live in a village where we have church services once a month, consequently we enjoy Dr. Talmage's and the other sermons more than we otherwise would. We are congregation lists. We have no meeting-house, so we cannot have our own dear pastor come, only when it is warm enough for him to hold service in the grove, as he resides about twenty miles from our habitation.

Subscriber, Gresham, Ky. Was Jesus born under an apple tree, or was he born in a stable?

In a stable at Bethlehem. The passage in the Song of Solomon (8:5) has no reference to the subject.

Subscriber, Mansfield, O. 1. What is Mr. Dwight L. Moody's address? 2. Can a minister of the Gospel be a Christian and play pool with some of his members at their home? 3. Is it right for a church member to have a pool-table at his home?

Mary A. W., Portland, Me. Can you give me any information in regard to the date of the destruction of Juno's Temple on the Island of Samos on the coast of Asia Minor?

Of the magnificent temple of Hera (Juno) built by Rhacids and praised by Herodotus as the largest in the world, only a few fragments now remain. It was probably in existence in the days of Pythagoras, but there is no clue to the date of its destruction, unless it be furnished by Panofka, who published a volume of Samian researches in 1822, in Berlin, or in the rare works of Tournefort, Koss, and Guerin, which also dealt with the same subject. They may be had in the Paris or Stuttgart libraries.

Mrs. G. S. P. Cleelum, Wash. Where in the Old Testament country was Padan-Aram—where Jacob went to get his wife?

In Mesopotamia. The name means the flat or table-land of Aram, a name by which the Hebrews designated Mesopotamia.

M. J. M., Clarence, Ind. Is it right and proper for a young man when he goes to see a young lady to stay after the rest of her family have all gone to bed, hour after hour, even until one or two o'clock in the morning, especially if his poor horse is standing out in the cold, tied to the fence or to a post, as is often the case in the country?

After making all proper allowances for youthful enthusiasm, we should conclude that parents who would permit such a practice to continue were careless both of the health and reputation of their children. No matter how worthy a young man may be, he is both ungallant and unwise to prolong his calls to unseemly hours, disturbing a household and robbing its members of sleep. No self-respecting young lady will wish her acquaintances to stay he is living a worldly life, or an immoral life, his past experience counts for nothing.

J. L. Bradshaw, Trenton, N. J. What can suggest to our debating club as the best view of the closing century?

The best and latest is the volume, entitled Notable Events of the Nineteenth Century, John Clark Kidpath, which is one of ten volumes comprising THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Premium Library for 1897.

Old Subscriber, Philadelphia, Pa. May one too urgently that a loved one be kept from temptation and sin? Is it possible that God will answer the prayer by removing such an one from earth to Heaven?

God reads the heart and knows the real sinner better than it is expressed by the lips. It would not be likely to answer such a prayer as you name in the letter, and not the spirit. The object of the prayer might die as you say, but the prayer would not lead to his death. There would be other reasons. The person offering such a prayer would see, however many others have done that the answer prayer may involve sorrow. Sometimes people pray for more faith and they get more faith by suffering which they did not desire.

Subscriber, Medina, O. Did Solomon write Books of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes? If so, who did?

It is impossible, at this date to settle questions of authorship. That Solomon wrote caused to be written, some portions of Book of Proverbs is probable. At the beginning of chapter 25 the statement is made: "Hezekiah's scribes collected a number of sayings attributed to Solomon, and added them to the book." This was 280 years after Solomon's death. Prov. 24:23 marks a miscellaneous authorship for the following Proverbs. They were current sayings by unknown authors. The last two chapters are also by unknown authors. It is extremely improbable that Solomon wrote the Book of Ecclesiastes. The language is a kind used at a much later epoch. It seems, throughout, the work of some author describing the dreary experience of Solo-

A. H. M., Luton, Ia. I notice that Talmage said in a recent issue that Christ gained by experience. Will you tell me how that can be when he must have known things from the beginning?

In becoming man, Christ voluntarily subjected himself to all human limitations. He was in all things like unto his brethren, except in sin. Luke explicitly (2:52) that he increased in wisdom. He took upon himself the form and with it the condition of its life, among which would be need of being educated like boys. We can imagine that his boyhood he was conscious of his divinity, the human life have been very strange to him. Experience alone could enlighten and it is that fact which so fitted him to be a High Priest could sympathize with our infirmities. His temptation in the wilderness was a human temptation passing through the ordeal of a human body, he learned the power of being tempted and consequently he "gained by experience" power to succor those who are tempted.

J. R. A., Collinsville, Conn. What do the terms shown in the Queen of Sheba (6 Kings) referring to the "ascend," and that there spirit left in her, mean?

The "ascend" by which Solomon went supposed to have been the arch support stairway connecting his palace with the temple. In those days it was regarded as a feat of engineering skill. The remark about Queen's spirit simply implies that she was overwhelmed with wonder and admiration.

game, like many others, may not be wrong in itself, it is known as a game peculiar to the lowest class of saloon gamblers everywhere, and this fact alone should be enough to deter any self-respecting person from indulging in it. Its associations are not reputable and its tendency is to gambling. See 1 Thess. 5:22.

M. A. B., Germantown, O. Do you think it right to ring the bell of a dedicated church to call men together to dig a ditch to drain the cellar?

It depends on the circumstances. We can imagine an emergency where such a hasty summons might be necessary to avert damage to the church building. The using of the bell for such a purpose would be unusual, but not wrong.

R. H. W., On a quiet in Ia. Is it right to license a wrong, if it is right for a Christian to encourage him by his vote?

No; to both queries. But wrong will never be entirely right until the millennium, and meanwhile those who stand for the right must be patient and bear with those who have less moral courage and spiritual light than themselves. Any step in the direction of right is to be deplored.

C. F. C., Flom, Mich. I. State briefly the origin of the Mohammedan religion. 2. Does the Greek Church recognize Christ as divine? What are its tenets generally?

1. It originated in the alleged revelation or prophetic vision of Mohammed on Mount Hira, when the angel Gabriel came to him (as he called him) holding a silken scroll and commanded him to recite what was written thereon. Subsequent revelations followed and these formed the basis of the new religion. 2. Yes, they agree with the Catholics in accepting the Subscriber, Queens Co., N. Y. Would it be wrong for a person to ride a bicycle, who had said he wouldn't ride, and afterward changed his mind and got a bicycle?

Certainly not. A person who would not "change his mind" on being convinced he was mistaken, would be a mulish sort of person in deed.

Anxious, Colchester, N. S. If I am conscious of a time when I passed through deep convictions and felt my heart was given to Christ and I found peace, is not that sufficient proof that I am a Christian without taking my present conduct into account? Is it Scriptural to preach that salvation depends on faith and conduct, and not on feelings and past experience?

If you are living in sin you may be quite sure that your past experience will not save you. The deep convictions and the finding peace may have been, and probably were, the beginning of the new life in you, but they are not a sufficient proof of your being a Christian. Numbers of people have passed through all that, who have not Christ's spirit and are therefore none of his. (See Rom. 8:9.) It is quite Scriptural to preach that salvation does not depend on the feelings. The immutable promise of God that whosoever believeth on Christ shall never perish, is the true ground for confidence. Wherever that faith is in the heart the life will be in accord with it and the man becomes more and more like Christ. If

IN HIS ANCESTRAL HOME

BY HON. SELAH MERRILL D.D. L.L.D.

JERUSALEM A CITY OF SURPRISES.

How a Stranger is Struck by the Smallness of the City, Wonderful Wall, its Narrow Streets, Stuffy Bazaars, and Curious People.

TENS of thousands of my readers have never been in Jerusalem and have only a very imperfect idea of what it is like. They compare it to Chicago, Baltimore, or Boston, but these places give no hint of what the Holy City really is. Could they be transported thither in a single night, what would be their sensations upon awakening in the morning? The dawn with its unspeakable glories, the sunrise over the city, would fill them with wonder. Their eyes once open, surprise after surprise would await them as they moved about at strange city with its strange people, customs, languages, noises, houses—everything so unlike what they had ever seen before. Quite likely the stone houses with their stone roofs, small whitewashed domes, stone floors, stone staircases, and only but heavily grated windows would first attract attention. In former times strong walls and barred windows were important means of defence. "What a little place!" my friends exclaim. "We thought that Jerusalem was a large city. We find it a very small one." Yes, it is only half a mile from east to west, about the same from north to south, and the greatest distance across it in any direction is three-quarters of a mile.

Although so small it has a labyrinth of streets and lanes where a stranger can easily get lost, so I propose to act as guide and conduct my friends to one point after another and explain the many novel objects and sights which await us on every hand. Already questions come from every one. "What is this?" "What is that?" "Who are those people?" "What are those things for?" "What a hilly place!" they all exclaim. "We thought it was a level city." No, that is a great mistake. Zion, Moriah, Akra, Bezetha, and Bethanien, formed a cluster of hills standing close to each other upon which the city was built, owing to the accumulation of rubbish and ruins during eighteen centuries past these hills are not so marked now as formerly. Moriah was a high, steep hill, with its eastern and western sides so precipitous that trenches had to be cut into the rock to make a sure foundation for the heavy walls which were carried to a great height and the spaces between them filled before houses could be erected upon it. One of the other hills were so steep with the exception of the eastern side of Zion. No one could now think of choosing such a place for a city.

"What a curious and quaint old town! Are we in fairy-land?" No, my friends, this is not fairy-land, the people are too dirty; their clothes are ragged and rags are so abundant. Fairy-land is not crowded with poverty and misery.

"But here is a massive gate apparently made of wood and covered with plates of iron. Fortunately it is open or we could never open it ourselves." You will notice the ragged soldiers who stand in its guard with guns as if they were afraid of somebody. The word "ragged" is not intended as a slander upon the poor soldier himself but as a finger-point at the wretched Turkish government which in its great army of half a million men has not a single volunteer, no such thing as patriotism being known, and which clothes its conscripts even in this capital of an important province of its empire, in the garb of beggars.

"But tell us about this wall which seems to extend around the city; never before were we in a walled city; we seem to be shut in like prisoners." This wall which encloses Jerusalem is forty feet high in some parts and sixty feet high in others. It is less than three miles in length and has four gates each bearing two names, Jaffa or Hebron Gate on the west, Zion or David Gate on the south, St. Stephen's or St. Mary's Gate on the east, and Damascus Gate or Gate of the Column on the north. We read in ancient books of "bulwarks" and the word has a formidable a smooth border round the edge (which we call "marginal draft" or "bevel"), belong to the Hebrew period. There in that part of the wall are some of the first Roman period, those yonder are of the late Roman period.

Those large square blocks are of the Byzantine period. These here are of the time of the Crusaders, and those small ones belong to the Moslem or Turkish period. Stones remain when empires are destroyed and men die, and in 1540, when the present wall was built, Suleiman the Magnificent who built it, found ready to his hand stones of almost every age from King Solomon, his Hebrew namesake, down to his own time. The blocks of stone of which Jerusalem's wall is constructed are not the least interesting of its many souvenirs of the past.

"You are leading us through narrow lanes and alleys and we can hardly make our way through this crowd of men, beasts and merchandise. Why not take us through

You must carry plenty of small change, or have the package sent to your house, or go to the nearest money-changer and get what you require. One reason of this bother is that it costs something to get money changed and the merchant puts that loss upon the customer. He does not supply himself with small change and add the cost to the price of the goods. We should regard this as the best way, but Orientals do not think so. Another very curious fact is that there is no such thing as a "market price" for any goods or articles that are bought or sold in Jerusalem. The practice of beating down enters into every transaction and is carried often to the extent of robbery.

"What is that boy screaming about?"

Is he selling newspapers? If you knew more about Jerusalem you would laugh at your own question. That boy has a bundle of roasted peas which everybody likes, and for half a cent he will give you all you wish. They grow on bushes six inches high. The stalks are pulled, and peas and stalks are roasted and sold together. As for newspapers: you are in Jerusalem where they do not exist. "A newspaperless city! Well, well!" Certainly, Turkey does not allow them, and none can be published without an Imperial permit (firman) which is never granted. Moreover the people have no comprehension of what a newspaper is for.

"What is going on in that house? Are the people quarrelling?" No, that is the House of Confusion, better known as a Mohammedan school. We will look inside a moment, we shall not disturb them. There are no maps, charts, or pictures on the walls. There is no blackboard, there are no books, there is not a chair, bench, or stool except a small divan (like a short covered box) at one end of the room. The literary aspect of the place is the same as that of a donkey stable. The children, who are all boys, remember, all sit on the floor. They have wooden slates on which a passage from the Koran is written, which the boys are supposed to commit to memory.

They all study out loud and at the tops of their voices—hubbub and confusion reign. Is it not a queer place? The teacher is an old man, with a long beard, a turban, and a long, loose-fitting robe or cloak. Hair, beard, and clothing are all very untidy; and spectacles and snuff box, perhaps a reed pen with a few drops of muddy ink, complete his outfit. This is the "system" of education that Turkey provides for its boys. As girls "have no souls" and are married before they are ten years of age, what is the use in trying to educate them?

"Who are those people yonder walking so slow and looking so solemn and dignified?" That is the Governor and two or three high officials with a Moslem priest on their way to the mosque to attend service. This is Friday, the Mohammedan holy day. Saturday is the Sabbath of the Jews, while Sunday is the Christians' day, as with us. In Jerusalem we have three Sundays, four Christmases, and five New Years. There are feast days innumerable which time and space would fail me to enumerate. Christians almost without exception close their places of business on Sunday and a very large proportion of them attend church every Sunday morning. The Jews are very strict in their observance of Sabbath. The stores and shops of the Moslems are never closed on their holy day and very few of them attend service in the mosques. With so many holy days Jerusalem ought to be a better place than it now is.

sound; but the practical American asks the use of these walls and gates. The question is a proper one for certainly they would not keep out a robber if he were nimble enough, and they could not possibly afford much protection in time of siege. They are interesting as relics of the past and useful now as object lessons for here we can appreciate what soldiers had to do when they were under a determined and threw down a wall before carrying a place by storm, and on the other hand we realize how soldiers by means of gates, walls and towers, could defend the city.

"How is it that the stones in this wall are not more nearly alike? The blocks are of all sizes, some have rough faces, some smooth faces, others have a curious border. Was it a strange fancy of the builders?" No, these stones date from different periods of history. The faces of the stones indicate their origin. Those blocks of massive proportions twenty to thirty feet long with very rough faces and one of the principal streets?" We have been through Christian street and are now in David street two of the widest and straightest streets in Jerusalem. They have no sidewalks, for if there were there would be no street left. This street is only fourteen feet wide and in some parts only ten feet. Six soldiers marching abreast just fill the street. Strangers find it rather difficult at first to get through the crowds but after a little they learn the art of doing so without being badly smirched by a dirty beggar or greasy camel, and without being trod upon. Men, women, children, soldiers, officials, beggars, travelers, besides horses, camels, donkeys and dogs are huddled together and jostle us at every step. When camels loaded with large boxes, one on each side, pass through the street everybody gives way; and a lady of my acquaintance used to follow along just behind the camels, for that was the only time when she was sure of a free passage.

If you wish to make any purchases you must stand in the street and dicker with the "merchant" who sits on the floor of his shop, about in the middle of it so that he can reach everything in his store without rising. Within a few years past some larger stores have been opened outside the Jaffa Gate, but I am describing the generality of stores in the city.

You have made your purchase and are ready to pay for the same. You offer money but the merchant says, "I cannot change it." In nine cases out of ten this happens and it seems so strange to us.

THE KING'S HIGHWAY

A STORY OF THE BROADER CHRIST-LIFE

CHAPTER V.

MEN PROPOSE; WOMEN DECIDE.

BY

AMELIA E. BARR.

had spoken gruffly, and with a decision they both understood and generally respected; though at this hour, had he cared to look at the people whom he advised, he would have been doubtful of their acquiescence. For, at his words, an electric spark leaped into Alice's eyes, a vivid color flashed to her cheeks, and she assumed the erect air of one ready for an encounter, though she did not attempt to provoke it. Mrs. Lloyd also remained silent, but Alice saw on her face an unusual expression, one which impressed her with the idea of an invincible purpose that might be delayed and opposed, but which would, in the end, be unconquerable. She remembered, when a child, seeing the same look constantly on her mother's face. It meant then the determined resolve to escape from the material world into the spiritual one, and she speculated as she drank her coffee as to what its meaning might be in the present case.

After the breakfast had been removed, Mrs. Lloyd, with the suddenness of one who knows she touches dangerous ground, and is yet determined to go on, said:

"Nicholas, I wish to see my lawyer."

If she had fired a pistol at her husband he could hardly have been more unpleasantly amazed. "What the mischief do you want with him?" he demanded, flinging the daily paper to the floor.

"I have a great deal of business with him. It is a long time since I went over my affairs. I want to know how they stand—how much money I have—how much more I am likely to have—and so on."

"And so on?" What does that mean?"

"Simply that I want to know whether he is doing right or wrong, whether my money is being put to good uses or bad."

"Ho! ho! You have got McAslin's 'stewardship' on your brain; I see. Well, now, get rid of that nonsense at once. I suppose, however, you will have to see Telford; for of course, you will wish to settle something on Alice at her marriage. Lord Medway and I have come at last to an understanding on financial matters. Have you considered the subject? Are you prepared to name the exact sum? Such a decision will be necessary immediately; at any rate before the anti-nuptial contract is drawn up."

"Father! Father!"

"What is it, Alice?"

"Are you talking of my marriage?"

"You know very well that I am talking of it."

"To Lord Medway?"

"Of course."

"I have made up my mind not to marry Lord Medway. I do not like being bargained about. Am I so very disagreeable that you are willing to give a stranger and a foreigner a large sum of money to take me away from you?"

"I am giving a large sum of money for your benefit and ennobling. I am buying you an earldom, and all its honors and privileges."

"You are buying me a husband, and he is costing you millions. Of the two transactions, I would rather be sold for millions. It would be less humiliating to have a husband give millions for me, than for you to give millions in order to induce some titled foreigner to marry me. I do not want an earldom, and I have fully determined to be neither bought nor sold."

"You look very handsome when you are in a temper, Alice, but your determination is a little too late. I have already promised you. The affair is being talked of throughout the financial and fashionable world. You cannot now draw back. It is impossible. There would be a certain amount of personal disgrace in it, and more humiliation than either you or I would like to face."

"Mother, what do you say?" Alice asked.

the question without any hope of her mother's interference. She was accustomed to see her retire from all disputes and quarrelsome decisions, and she was, therefore, amazed to hear her answer—

"Unless you love Lord Medway I think you will do wrong to marry him."

"I do not love him."

"Then, let me tell you Alice," said Mr. Lloyd, "you have behaved shamefully to the young man. You accepted his attentions and permitted him to write you. I am confounded by your behavior, which places me also in a false and shameful position. I am not going to allow a foolish notion to ruin your life! Nor will I allow you to make a fool of me! I have gone to no end of trouble to secure your future, and I shall take very good care that you fulfill your part of our obligation to Lord Medway."

"I have no part in any obligation to Lord Medway."

"You have. Actions speak as well as a written bond. You have accepted Medway's attentions—yes, Miss, accepted them with smiles, and now you propose to jilt the man you have allured on to a false position."

"Jilt! Allured! Nicholas you ought not to use such words to your daughter."

"She ought not to deserve them."

"I do not deserve them. You asked me to receive Lord Medway, and try to like him. I received him as I would any other guest of yours. At first I even thought it might be possible to do as you wished me. I was dazzled as any young girl might be by his title, and by the new life I might share with him. But I never suffered him to see that I was influenced by these thoughts. We walked and drove and spent some hours together every day, of course, but common hospitality to a guest demanded so much attention and courtesy."

"He made love to you, and you accepted it."

"He said such pretty words as young men say to young women whom they wish to please—for the sake of millions of money. I accepted his compliments at my own valuation—which was less than nothing at all."

"He has not written you love letters?"

"He has written me two letters, both within the last four days; that is, since he was satisfied with the premium you have promised him, if he will only marry me. I answered neither of the letters. I have destroyed both of them."

"Nicholas," said Mrs. Lloyd, "we know what a loveless marriage means. Surely you will spare —"

He would listen no longer. With a rude anger he turned away, muttering, even while he put on his hat and overcoat, expressions of his passion and determination that were more forcible than considerate or refined. Left alone, a sudden silence fell between mother and daughter. Alice went to the window and looked out with that vacant gaze which perceives nothing. All her being was swallowed up in feeling. Mrs. Lloyd sat pondering the new perplexity that had forced itself into her already disturbed mind. She was little used to take the initiative, and the force of habit added to her uncertainty, made her now wait for Alice to open the conversation. Alice waited for sympathy, she was hurt that it did not flow to her with a quick spontaneity, and when she did speak it was in a tone of indignant in jury.

"Thank God," she cried, "men can no longer bargain their daughters away like cattle. Mother, I wonder you could bear it! Why did you not tell father that I was free born, and a citizen of no mean country? I will marry no man unless I wish to marry him. If I love him and he loves me, I will give up everything and dare everything, and bear everything for him. I want to be loved. I want to be loved more than any other thing. I never have been much loved. Father loves nothing but money, and I am not good enough for you to love, dear mother. You pity me, and you pray for me, but how can you love me?"

"Oh, Alice! Alice! Do not say such cruel words."

"Are they not true?"

"No! No! I love you with all my soul."

"Then talk to me, and advise me, and comfort me. Have I not the right to love and to be loved? Did you not marry for love? Yes, you did; for you were very rich and father was poor then. You must have loved him?"

"There ought to be love on both sides, Alice, or else there is sorrow enough for both. I loved, indeed, but when love is continually thrown back upon itself, it dies; it dies cruelly hard, but it dies."

"Forgive me darling mother! Have I made you cry? Oh, how I despise my selfishness! I see it all now. Father has never loved you, he cares for nothing but his business, nor for any one but these who can help his schemes in some way; no, not even Steve, the dear, noble boy, whom he takes no trouble to understand. I see, I see at this hour, the long loveless years that you have lived; the sad doubting, and fearing, and hoping, and final despairing. How did you bear it? I wonder you did not die."

"You are buying me a husband!" said Alice.

"I did not die because in my great sorrow I found within myself internal light and strength that the world knows nothing of."

"I have not found that, and I must come to you. Shall I marry Lord Medway because father says I must?"

"You are the keeper of your own heart and conscience, Alice. Do what they tell you to do. Never throw your decisions on others; at the last you will take your desire or suffer in its want."

"Is it wrong to love?"

"It is right to love. Nearly always some unknown force draws a girl to the one man in the world for her."

"Hardly any one now believes in that experience, mother."

"Yet it is the only Divine right on earth. When people do not believe in it, it is because they are incapable of such a grand passion, or else unwilling to abide with it, for you must know, Alice, that love in some way or other always demands the austere sweetness of sacrifice. And so few dare to try the blessedness of 'giving up.'"

"Mother, I want you to stand by me in this matter. I do not want money. I want love. Please do not send for Mr. Telford on my account."

"I am not sending for him on your account. There has been a revolution in my soul during the past night, Alice. The words I heard yesterday from the two men at the dinner-table, put all my spiritual nature in disquietude and distress. I perceived that I had been a very selfish worshipper of God and goodness. And just before dawn this morning a more excellent way was shown me. I intend to take it at once. I shall want money in order to do so. I shall want a great deal of money. But if my affairs have been handled honestly I ought to have more than sufficient, and believe they have."

"Mr. Telford is a good man. Grandfather Valliante trusted him implicitly. Mother, what must I do about Lord Medway? What will be father's next move in the matter?"

"I think it will be to bring him out here. In that case I would be perfectly polite—and perfectly honest. You must wait for events, you cannot force them."

To the young heart full of feeling, this waiting for events is the great trial. Alice wished for Lord Medway's arrival, in order that she might at once put an end to his hopes, and her own connection with them. But that day not a person of any kind called, and the hours went by with an exhausting monotony. It was, however, some comfort to anticipate Jessie's visit the following morning. She was sure Jessie would approve her rebellion.

Jessie always admired women who had the courage necessary to stand by their wishes or their opinions. But Jessie heard Alice's confidence with a face that quite dashed her, and with a silence that was most unlike Jessie's usual readiness to advise or sympathize. Alice was last forced to a direct question.

"Have I not done very wisely, Jessie?" she asked.

"I don't think you have. If you wish my opinion I think you have acted very foolishly. Why excuse have you for throwing away so much?"

"I throw away Lord Medway because I do not love him."

"Do you love any one else?"

"I do not know."

"And yet you give up a coronet for something so intangible you don't know whether you have it or not. Mr. Lloyd has reason to be angry with you. Think what people will say. No one will believe for a moment that you refused Lord Medway; they will look on you with that contempt maids; forlorn and maids desert get from them. They will each render their own version of his Lordship's reasons for refusing to marry you—only this morning I saw your marriage announced in the principal papers."

"Jessie McAslin!"

"It is the truth."

"It is impossible! I have never given any one authority to make such a statement."

Jessie unfolded the morning paper she held in her hand, and Alice, to her utter consternation, saw her own and Lord Medway's portraits in united circles. The marriage was definitely spoken of as certain to occur during the summer, and so entirely gratuitous statements were made concerning the bride's age and requirements; her reputed fortune; the marvellous presents she was to receive, and the magnificent trousseau in preparation.

She read the article through with indignation, her tears fell fast and hot upon the offending paper. "It is my father's doing," she said. "He thinks after this public port of it I will be compelled to acquiesce. I will do nothing of the kind."

"I am sorry you cannot persuade yourself to accept good fortune. Most girls would marry a much less desirable man for the sake of his title."

"I think Alice Lloyd just as pretty name as Lady Medway," was the reply.

SINCERITY.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week beginning Feb. 7. Ps. 15: 1-5; Zech. 8: 16-17.

WE are accustomed to think of the writers of the Old Testament as being concerned chiefly with ritual, with sacrifices, with ceremonies and with tithes. It is, however, a somewhat superficial view. An attentive reader of the Psalms and the prophets knows that mere observance was seen to be valueless of itself, and the people were warned that it was not acceptable except as it was an expression of something far deeper in human nature. In the Psalm associated with the Topic, in Isaiah 1: 10-16, in the familiar passage in Micah (6: 6-8), and in numberless passages of Jeremiah, Ezekiel and the minor prophets the people are told again and again that God's requirements are of the simplest kind, and they do not include sacrifice. God will be no party to a bargain by which men may live in sin and pay for it with costly offerings. In the New Testament the same lesson is taught. There has been persistent effort to read into the Gospels and Epistles a theory of a substitution of faith and doctrine for righteousness, but it fails. From the New Testament saint, as from the people under the Old Dispensation, there is the same demand for righteousness and purity of life. God will forgive sin, but for the hypocrite, the man who is living in sin and offering formal observance, he has nothing but scorn. The sinner who comes to him with repentance is welcome, though he be ever so great a sinner, and God will work with him for his redemption from his bondage to sin, but he has no patience with the man who pretends to holiness while he is living a sinful life. Jesus came to save the people from their sins. No man who does not want to be saved from them can benefit from his having lived and died. He may be so completely enslaved by his sin that he clings to it and loves it, but if he will submit himself to Christ, he gains new ideals, and his sin becomes odious to him. He needs only to believe in him and trust him, and Christ will lead him to repentance and give him power to overcome his propensity to sin. The first step toward purity of heart and life is surrender to Christ.

It seems almost a paradox to insist on the necessity of sincerity to self. Yet every Christian worker knows that there are many who are self-deceived. Even so common a matter as attendance at church, the force of habit, concern for reputation or enjoyment of friendly association are frequently the real causes for attendance while the man is crediting himself with purer motives. In giving to charity or to religious causes, here is a desire to be seen of men, to have the benefaction known and admired, which mars the gift and detracts from its value. In amusements, a man will excuse himself for going with the world, and will use sophistry with himself to silence the voice of conscience. A rigid and impartial self-examination is often necessary before we realize exactly where we stand.

Still more is there need of sincerity toward God. How many really desire the things for which they pray? If the man who prays for more faith, knew that the only way in which he could get it, would be to take away his property, or afflict him in some other way, that the roots of his faith might take a firmer grip, the prayer would not be offered so often as it is. It is humiliating to think how often he who reads the heart must know that our words before him are insincere.

Sincerity toward others is less common even than the other two relations. The "brother" or the "dearly beloved brother" sounds perfectly well that the man whose speech is larded with the epithets, has no brotherly feeling in his heart, and could not, in any emergency, be relied upon to do a brother's part. The cordial greeting, the pressing invitation that is not intended to be accepted, the assurance of friendly interest which does not exist, the profession of sympathy which, as Carlyle said, is "from the lips outward"—all these are common and are practically falsehoods

PATIENT WAITING.

I waited patiently for the Lord, and he inclined unto me, and heard my cry. (Ps. 40: 1, 2, 3.)

LET thy "Waiting" be with patience
Tho' the hours seem drear and long;
Not one moment shall be wasted,
God will recompense with song.
Every joy so long awaited—
Every cherished hope belated—
Shall at last be celebrated Yonder 'midst the throng.
Let no anxious thought possess thee
From thy heart no murmur cast.
He who notes a falling sparrow
Can but heed thy cry at last.
Fret not then, but hush the rather
From thy "Patient Waiting" gather Golden thoughts from God thy father—
Till thy "Waiting" 's past.
Then when "Waiting" shall he over
And we're gathered home to rest;
All our earthly conflicts ended,
And our "Patient Waiting" hest.
Nevermore to know of sighing,
Heartaches vanished—no more crying,
Nevermore to know denying—Satisfied at last.

THE FAITHFUL SHEPHERD.

THERE is a faithful Shepherd,
Who loves so tenderly,
That when his sheep go far astray
He follows after, night and day
Through forest wild and over lea;
Their need the only plea.

Our gracious, loving Shepherd
Will not give up his sheep;
But searches, searches, though alone,
Until he hears the lost one's moan;
And, when he finds his wandering sheep,
For joy his people weep.

How tender is his pity;
How watchful is his care!
If sick or wounded he will heal;
If blind he will the way reveal;
If hurdened he the load will bear—
None ever need despair.

Is he your tender shepherd?
And are you in the fold?
Why will you grieve the Spirit more,
And stay outside the open door?
In Jesus Christ the Lord behold
The way into the fold!

THE LORD'S BODYGUARD.

A Prophetic Vision in Revelation of the Company of Honored Saints.

By ARCHDEACON NIN LAIR.

THE Lord's own bodyguard! His chosen companions on all his heavenly errands! What a glorious vision this is which St. John gives us of the typical chosen ones of all the myriads of the redeemed! Our Lord in his glorified humanity, reigning, judging, administering, all the forces of his ever-growing kingdom on earth, the warring at the head of the hosts of heaven against the powers of evil; leading his friends in the hours of peace over the green pastures, by the still waters. Or, again, with some look of his humanity about him that made the apostle speak of him as the Lamb that had been slain, but now full of noble and regal power, like some glorious creature that had seven horns—seven emblems of strength—and his eyes glowing with a Divine fire that made them seem as though he had seven eyes, a seven-fold faculty of sight,—stepping forward amidst the reverent worship of heaven to take that awful book of knowledge and revelation from the sublime, mysterious Presence that sat on the throne. All his sufferings are long over; the complete sacrifice of his death and passion he presented to his Father as he passed into heaven, the true and eternal holiest of holies, on his ascension day, amidst the tumultuous acclaim of the countless hosts of angels, and sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high.

But heaven is not motionless, and as the earthly years and centuries still roll on below, he has glorious deeds to do, until at last his enemies have been made his footstool and he shall have subdued all things to his Father. Various, indeed, are the versions which St. John gives us of his missions of heavenly glory and conquest. Here in the fourteenth chapter he is standing on the citadel of heaven, of which Mount Zion is adopted as the earthly type, and with him is the bodyguard of one hundred and forty and four thousand. The number is purely ideal, and is taken to express the full roll call of the truest men of God. The same number is used to describe the wide completeness of the redeemed from the Hebrew race. They have his Father's name written on their foreheads—that is, their redemption and glorification have placed there the unmistakable look of Divine approbation, nobility, courage, singleness of heart, immortal happiness, and untiring splendor of soul. Thunders of glorious melody fell through the empyrean from that Divine bodyguard, compared with which all the most magnificent strains of martial music that the armies of the world have ever heard is tame and poor. And as the vigorous voices of such unearthly company of melodists sometimes unite with the chords of trumpet and flute and rouse the hearers to a yet higher pitch of enthusiasm, so the songs of the Lord's bodyguard on the citadel of heaven rose with the music of their celestial instruments in thrilling harmonies, which floated echoing through the listening vaults of the blue dome of infinity. But no man could learn that song of the hundred and forty and four thousand which were redeemed from the earth.

St. John gives us another vision in chap. 19, of the Captain of the bodyguard going forth from the citadel when the last echo of the mighty minstrelsy has died away. There is a description of our Lord as Captain, and here is the bodyguard. "And the armies which were in heaven followed him upon white horses. What a subject for a painter, to think of all the greatest and noblest and best of men as members of that glorious brigade, with their features transfigured but still to be known, and the glory of eternal youth and holiness shining from them as they march.

We have known exquisite pictures of the saints gathered on the flowery lawns of heaven, with glimpses of delicious landscapes behind them, and the celestial palaces, but I do not remember any attempt at the joyous faces of the Lord's happy warriors. It is among them I should like to see my nearest and dearest.

CLASS FOR COLORED GIRLS AT THE NEW YORK COOKING SCHOOL.

COOKERY AS AN ART.

A New York Training Institute where Nurses, Missionaries, Deaconesses and School Girls are Taught the Culinary Art in All its Details.

IF any reader of this journal should find time to drop in for an hour or more, at the United Charities building, on Fourth avenue, corner Twenty-second street, New York City, and seek out the headquarters of what is known as The New York Cooking School, the visitor would no doubt meet with an agreeable surprise. Here, in a busy hive which combines education and philanthropy, hundreds of young women—many belonging to rich families and others quite poor—are trained in the culinary art, as it applies to various positions in life—the home, the mission, the hospital, the school, the sickroom.

Miss Emily Huntington is Superintendent of the school, with Miss E. Andrews, as Secretary, but there is behind them two working officials an incorporated Society, which includes among its members some of the wealthiest and best known people in New York, all of whom are interested in the school, and especially so in this school, at which many of their own young people attend classes. The President is Mrs. Theodore B. Bronson, and among the Trustees are, Mrs. W. H. Osborn, Mrs. Aaron J. Vanderpoort, Mrs. W. E. Locke, Jr., Mrs. Aaron S. Hewitt, and Mrs. Morris K. Lewis, while Joseph Potter, Rev. Dr. H. L. May, and Rev. Dr. H. L. May, and others constitute the Advisory Committee. There is also a Board of Trustees, and as managers of the school.

The classes of the work are divided into three main branches, and each of these branches is further divided into several classes. The first branch is the domestic class, which is for the training of girls in the art of cooking, and the second branch is the hospital class, which is for the training of girls in the art of nursing, and the third branch is the mission class, which is for the training of girls in the art of teaching. The school is open to all girls, regardless of race or color, and the tuition is free. The school is a very successful one, and it is a great blessing to the community.

girls or very young women, in the afternoons, at which time also the deaconesses and nurses have classes. All the money realized from the tuition of the wealthy pupils is applied to the support of the evening classes for the working girls, so that the morning pupils have the pleasure of knowing that while benefiting themselves, they are also aiding others and are thus building up and solidifying a practical and worthy charity.

An interesting hour is that which is set apart for the colored pupils. Among the mission pupils last year were girls from the New York Colored Mission and the Methodist Zion Colored Church. There were also courses of lessons given to white pupils as follows: Grace Church Deaconesses, Hope Chapel Girl's Club, Calvary Working Girls, Trinity Mission House, City Mission Working Girls' Class, City Mission Bible Readers, Children's Aid Society Italian Class, New York Orphan Asylum, Hebrew Louis Mission Industrial School, and many other institutions of like character. Teachers were sent to Norfolk, Va., Berkeley, Va., Winchester, Va., Detroit, Mich., Chattanooga, N. Y., Luedo, N. Y., and Baltimore, Md.

Altogether, the Cooking School is an educational charity comparatively new but clearly destined to grow, and to exercise a beneficent and wholesome influence on many communities throughout the land.

Girls as Gardeners.

In Berlin, a lady of means has made an interesting experiment in training girls to light gardening as a business, and her example may not be undeserving of attention here, where there are so many new developments in industrial work for women. She took fifteen young girls and taught them the art of growing all sorts of vegetables, as well as apples, melons, grapes, pears and cucumbers, for which a ready sale is found. They wear a dark gray uniform, consisting of a bodice and a skirt of reasonable length, which can be made quite short for working in, and let down at will. The girls eclipsed all the men at a recent board of agriculture examination, and one of them has obtained a post as gardener at a salary $120 a year, with board and lodging. They are all fine specimens of healthy, vigorous womanhood.

The Small Boy and the Birds.

Apropos of our article on Bird Day in a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a correspondent writes as follows: "I was much interested in your article on Bird Day, but the destruction of our song birds is not wholly the fault of the small boy. His mother is as much to blame when she wears upon her winter hat two or three small birds, or a half dozen of wings, or a waving aigrette. Will you not make an appeal to the women, through your paper, in behalf of the birds of America? There are other things as pretty to trim a hat with, and to kill our birds for that is selfish and thoughtless."

THE STORY OF THE MINUTES.

WE are but minutes—little things! Each one furnished with sixty wings, With which we fly on our unseen track, And not a minute ever comes back.

We are but minutes—yet each one bears A little burden of joys and cares, Patiently take the minutes of pain—The worst of minutes cannot remain.

We are but minutes—when we bring A few of the drops from pleasure's spring, Taste their sweetness while we stay—It takes but a minute to fly away.

We are but minutes—use us well, For how we are used we must one day tell. Who uses minutes, has hours—to use, Who loses minutes, whole years must lose.

Home and The Heart.

NOTHING the world offers can permanently alienate the love of home, which is deeply rooted in every human heart. Home is of divine origin. In a pleasant article in The New Race, a writer gives this glowing picture of the real home: "That which is to make home most desirable does not abide in the parlor, the garret, or the cellar; does not grow with the flowers of the garden nor with the trees of the forest, neither does it come with the uncounted million, but it is beautifully expressed in the quaint old adage, 'Home is where the heart is.' There can never be a home where love does not abide, this being the one element in which all else lives; the one omnipotent power leading us away from malice, hate, envy, strife, every discord of sin, if we will but try and express it. Love must not only be constant, but constantly expressed. It is the one ever-acting power that never wears out. We see men and women wandering around in quest of pleasure, seeking it and the confidants among entire strangers; unfolding their plans to those having no interest in them, and who will use the innocent confidences in the future as weapons with which to strike them. A good, dutiful child can never afford to place confidence outside his father's family, however little it is solicited therein; the true, unselfish parental love is ever more constant and loyal than a friend among strangers.

Too many learn this sad lesson of misplaced confidence only by recounting simple, innocent happenings which are too often repeated with a fiery another light and meaning, in that way causing years of bitter anguish. In the light and home of all of these there are times when a restless, turbulent current threatens to wreck our vessel on the shoals of confusion and strife. Our parents are faithful to trust and love, unless we betray theirs with our disobedience and disloyalty; they let us steer for ourselves. And if but the one party had suffered it would not be lamentable, but they do others down with them. Miserable and guilty is the man who quits his home to find enjoyment. Lost is the woman who does it. Unhappy the daughter who does not find home her happiest spot on earth."

Southern Sunshine.

It is pleasant, in these winter days, to read of a land of sunshine and plenty, such as that described by the lady who sends this letter from the "Home Circle."

IN TEXAS, I am near the land of the Acadians. In reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I've thought of the many poor people suffering from cold and hunger in cities, and of the thousands of acres of occupied land here. In this climate, no children go barefooted the year round. In December, January, and February it is times when it is cool, and they wear shawls for a few days. In the country, they may be for the gathering. We came from the north years ago. My home is in the pine woods that surround us like a wall, nearly a hundred feet high. It is a good country for poor people, living being very cheap here. One raises their own corn, beef, pork, vegetable, poultry, and rice. The last costs to get it made. This is a small town; there is a lumber here, but no saloons. Mrs. M.

THE BOOK SHELF

What Suffering Is For.*

NO one who reflects upon the intricacy and the mystery of all life is surprised to find dark problems surrounding the condition and the destiny of man. The absence of such problems would be a greater mystery in their presence. Man's finiteness loads out on every side to God's infiniteness, and life's mystery is also life's majesty.

One of the darkest problems surrounding the condition of man is the problem of Human Suffering. Disappointment, grief, sorrow, sickness, trouble, death, are everywhere. Wherever man goes, suffering goes, lying, as it were, in ambush for him. It matters not what man's errand may be, the best or the worst, suffering awaits him. He may go out into life as the teacher, the comforter, the missionary, the friend—or he may go as the destroyer—the robber, the seducer, the slave—go how he will, and for what he will, he suffers, he sorrows, he dies. Such is the omnipresence of human suffering, this dark enigma of sorrow. One may say of it as the Psalmist said of God: "Whether shall I flee from thy presence? I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me. If I say, Surely the darkness shall cover me, the darkness hideth not from thee, the darkness and the light are both alike to thee." Who can travel so far, who can neglect himself so thoroughly, who can exclude himself so proudly, that he shall escape from trouble and sorrow and pain and death?

That man forever attempts to solve this problem of human suffering, to give a rational account of this stern condition inseparable from his life, is the result of an original intuition of man's nature. Involuntarily we tend to trace all sensations to their source. Walking in springtime through some hollow lane, we catch the waft of violets, and lift the eyes to note the bank, purple with bloom. Standing in sunlight we see a shadowed form outlined on the path beside our own, and strive to identify the friend who has joined us. Tortured with some strange pain shooting through the head or clutching at the heart, we go to the physician to learn that lesion is its cause. This is intuitive inquiry into the causes of sensations, and the same intuition prompts man to solve the problem of the universal human sorrow. It is incredible that rational beings involved in suffering shall not try to find out why they suffer.

Invariably when man confronts the problem of suffering he uses his doctrine of God to aid him in the solution. The history of human thought in all times and in all religions will, it is believed, be found to verify this statement. By a companion intuition to that which prompts man to ask why he suffers, man is prompted to feel that God is in some way related to his sufferings.

The darkest enigma hovering over human suffering vanishes when we believe that all as it is, not because God wills it, but because the blessed plan he willed or the world is thrust aside by man's perversity. The trouble that in a thousand forms fills the world to-day is the melancholy harvest of generations of weakening tendencies, mistaken ideas, sinful propensities, and foolish choices, complicated by the added errors of each new day of life. Awful as that harvest is, one can yet look upon it without despair in the light of the Divine Sacrifice. For the Face that we see upon the Cross is not the face of him that wrought this confusion and wreaked his misery; it is not the face of the enemy that sowed the tares of evil amid the wheat of good: it is the Face of him who loved us and gave himself up for us; the Face of him who, forasmuch as the children of men were partakers of flesh and blood, himself also took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that hath the power of death, that is, the devil; the Face of him who bore our griefs and carried our sorrows; the Face of him that sitteth on the throne and saith: "Behold, I make all things new." And as we look upon that wondrous Face, marred then with sorrow, radiant now with victory, we attribute not to him any share in causing the sufferings of the race for which he died; we soil not the lustre of his name by involving it with distresses which are directly or indirectly the outcome of our sinful estate. "The wages of sin is death, but the free gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord."

Does God send trouble? Fear not to ask and to answer that question when you confront the dark mystery of human suffering. But ask it and answer it in the light of the Divine Sacrifice. Answer it not in the presence of those startling acts of judgment recorded in the Old Testament annals, lest you be drawn by local conditions far out of touch with God's essential relation to man. Those Old Testament acts of judgment were the heroic measures by which he roused to moral consciousness his deluded race when it had sunk to that abyss of degradation of which St. Paul speaks in the first chapter of Romans, when the very sense of right and wrong had vanished into insensibility, and could only be resuscitated through shocks of judgment. Take not these peculiar conditions as your standard of inquiry in answering the question. Does God send trouble? And answer not that question by observations made along the narrow groove of your personal affairs, lest the snare of a perverted doctrine of Providence capture you, and you conceive of troubles and worries springing from evident physical causes as petty persecutions from God to drive you into the way of righteousness. Ask the question. Does God send you trouble? as you stand before the Cross of Jesus Christ, as you worship him in his Godhead, as you realize that his Humiliation is the supreme expression of God's hatred for sin, as disobedience in its essence and as sorrow and misery in its results; ask it at the Cross, and an answer will be given you out of the depths of the Divine Sacrifice, to make you sure that he who died to redeem the race is not he who by trouble and sorrow is making men old before their time, and breaking women down with hardship and anguish.

Does God permit trouble? No! He is against it as he is against the causes from which it springs. Why then does it exist? Because man is free, and his freedom is the one thing God cannot take away from him. He gave him the freedom of his volition as an inalienable and constitutional gift, when he gave him his being; and it is man's misuse of his freedom that makes this world a world of sorrow. It cannot be otherwise until man is subdued in his will to God. It cannot be otherwise until each member of the redeemed race shall have consecrated his personal will to him who gave it.

The Church and Idle Labor.*

IT is much easier to be interested in speculative views as to the nature of the Deity; much easier to observe forms of devotion, much easier to give money or build churches, than to manifest love to our fellows in the acts of daily life, in buying, selling, and getting gain. The Pharisees of old made long prayers and then defrauded widows. There is too much truth in the saying that in our day men are willing to offer their prayers and praise on Sunday, if on Monday they may go into the market place and skin their fellows and sell their hides."

If the Church is to help in solving the social problems of our age it must first remove the beam from its own eye. It must be a more living embodiment of the spirit of social service, it must insist on love as the great essential in its members. When men see Christ's spirit in Christ's flock, they will more readily believe in the efficacy of Christ's principles to solve our social problems.

When we are clear as to the causes we can better bring home the responsibility. Every one must bear his share of responsibility for things being as they are. Modern industry is more and more falling into the hands of companies. It is for the Church to awaken the consciences of the shareholders to their responsibility, to convince them that it is their duty to ascertain how the business in which their money is invested is carried on, whether efforts are made to prevent irregularity of employment, whether the hours of unskilled laborers such as tramway men are excessive and the general conditions humane, and make it felt that righteousness is of more importance than an increase in the rate of dividend.

A friend of mine, who was a shareholder in a certain company, learnt that the conditions under which the women workers were employed were unsatisfactory, and conducive to immorality. He drew the attention of the directors to this, pointing out that the hours and pay exposed their employees to great temptation to prostitution, for they could not support and clothe themselves on the pittance they received. He was informed with brutal frankness that the company had no concern with that. Plenty could be obtained who would accept the conditions. My friend withdrew his investment. If every churchman acted thus, there would soon be a change in the tone of the reports presented at annual meetings, industrial conditions would be recognized as being as important as dividends, and it would be admitted that even to companies the rule applies, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness" and then, and not till then, other things such as dividends shall be added.

It is for the Church to bring home the responsibility, not of investment only, but of expenditure, and make each ask himself: When there are so many whose lives are poor and meagre, poor in pleasures both as regards kind and quality, poor in those things which give interest and variety to life, pictures and books and music and travel, and who for lack of these are dull or seek distraction in rough, coarse ways which alone are readily within their reach, how far am I justified in heaping up luxuries for my self-indulgence? Is not the best use I can make of such luxuries not to keep them for myself, but to use them to brighten other lives, to let others share?

An Exciting Adventure.*

I BECAME aware that a huge serpent was coiled around one of the bamboo rafters, with some four feet of his body hanging down directly over my head, with his eyes flashing and his tongue darting out, just above where my book had been and had concealed him. He had evidently been asleep in the roof; the putting in of the cot had awakened him. While I was reading he let down one-third of his body or more, and was looking to see what this leprous-looking white man was about, for he probably had never seen a white man before.

His darting tongue was almost within arm's-length of my face when I caught sight of him. Off that cot I came at one bound to my feet without raising my head, for that serpent was too near it.

Running to the door, I seized an iron spit some five or six feet long, with a sharp point, used for roasting purposes in the jungle, and which was in the cart. Coming back and using that as a spear, I was successful at the first thrust in piercing the body of the serpent where it was coiled around the rafter.

But then I found myself in another difficulty. I caught hold of the spear to keep it from falling out and releasing the serpent, but the serpent would draw back, and with a tremendous hiss strike at my hand that held the spear, and come suspiciously near hitting it with his tremendous extended fangs.

However, in answer to my hasty call, my servant soon appeared with a bamboo club. Holding the spit with my left hand, taking the club in my right, I administered to the serpent a headache, from which he died. As I took him down and held him up by the middle, on the spit, to the level of my shoulder, both head and tail touched the floor, showing that he was about ten feet long.

Just as I was telling him in this position one of the village watchmen passed the door of the hut going into the village, and saw what I had done. It occurred to me at once that now I should find myself in a "bad box," for the people revere serpents as demigods. They dare not kill them or harm them, and will always beg for the life of a serpent if they see any one else killing one. They think that if you harm one of these deadly serpents or its kin will wage war on you and your kin and descendants until your kin are exterminated. I, a missionary, had come there to preach; how would they hear me when I had killed one of their gods? I saw the chief men of the place coming out toward the hut. To my astonishment they had native brass trays in their hands, with sweetmeats, cocoanuts, limes, and burning incense-sticks on them; and as they came to the door of the hut they prostrated themselves before me, and then presented these offerings: for they said I had rid them of their most dangerous enemy, that that serpent had been the bane of that village for several years. It had bitten and killed some of their kine and, I think, also a child. They had made every effort to drive it away from the village by burning straw closer and closer to make it go farther and farther away, but it would always return. They had tried to coax it away by putting little cups, each holding half a teaspoonful of milk, every two yards or so out into the jungle; but as soon as it had drunk all the milk it wanted it would turn round and crawl back into the village and into some house, and then the people of that house would have to vacate until it chose to leave. It had become the terror of the village. Let now I, a stranger and foreigner, had killed it without their knowledge or consent. That was their safety; for if they had seen me doing it they would have begged for its life, lest they be taken as accomplices. Now it was dead, and they were grateful, and it could harm them and theirs no more. Would I please accept these sweets? They had sent to the flock in the fields to have a fat sheep brought me as an offering, and would I please accept the sheep? Now whatever I had to say they would listen to me gladly, for was not I their deliverer? The sheep was brought; myself, associates, and attendants made a sumptuous dinner from it.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

VANITY.

IT was a great house with a stately hall and a winding staircase going up to wide galleries and lofty chambers. The house stood on a hillside, with green terraces between it and the tossing, tumbling sea, and behind it there was a garden, large, rambling, and very old-fashioned.

In this garden there was a fountain, and a basin beside the fountain was the home of gold and silver fish, and in the mornings the birds came here to dip and splash and preen their feathers.

All around the fountain were thick hedges of privet and box, and near by were box trees cut and clipped in quaint and formal shapes, representing Queen Elizabeth and the ladies of the court. What with their hoops, farthingales, and ruffs, the stately dames in the box garden brought back a brilliant page of history to the pleased on-looker, and when the on-looker was a child who could take her book and read and dream in this sweet place, why the child felt as if she could reach up and touch heaven with one up-lifted hand.

But the crowning glory of the place in the eyes of many visitors was not the garden, but the room of the princess in the house itself. Not a princess of the blood royal precisely, but a princess nevertheless was the oldest daughter of the house to whom, by long tradition, a certain chamber belonged.

When the house was built the builder said: "I will make my favorite daughter's room a dream of beauty. Whatsoever she wants shall be there. And as she will, herself, be prettier than anything I can choose for her, there shall be great mirrors from floor to ceiling on two sides of the room, so that she may behold herself whenever she likes."

So the room was adorned with great mirrors set in the walls. I slept in the room long after its first occupant had fallen asleep and been laid to rest in a land across the sea, but the room with its rich furnishings had not been changed. Tapestries and statuary, carvings and glass, all were the same. For it is we who pass away like shadows. Our little lives are running out as a tale that is told, while the things our brains plan, and our hands fashion, abide unimpaired through centuries.

A girl of our present period coming into the mirror-room one day had two thoughts. The first was, "Oh! what a splendid place to see how my gowns hang. I love to get the full effect of my dress, and I never can in a bit of a looking-glass over my bureau."

The next thought was: "I must try to be good in this room. Why, I can almost see my soul in these clear surfaces. I can never be cross or unreasonable, or selfish or deceitful here, for the mirror on one side or the other will catch and display the mean and ugly expression." Following this as by a shaft of revelation came the text: "Thou God seest me!" Yes, needing no mirror, God ever reads the soul, and sees its faults and defects not only. God be praised! but its want, its aspiration, its desires after holiness, and its struggles toward the better life. "Thou God seest me," should be as a stronghold into which the tempted and the tried may run in the day of their greatest need.

Speaking of the vanity of earthly things, let us not set our affections on any possession. To cling to that which the tempest may sweep away in a breath, which moth and rust may ruin, and which thieves may break through and steal away from us, is foolish and vain. We may enjoy it, we may not care. We are but stewards of God's goods, and our life accounts to the power which belongs to him. We must not let our eyes and hearts be so much on the things of this world, but let us look to the things that are above. More and more as we grow in grace, we shall find that the things of this world are but vanity, and that the things that are above are the things that are real. We shall find that the things of this world are but vanity, and that the things that are above are the things that are real.

readily reprove the children and young people when they like to look in the glass. Favor is deceitful and beauty is vain, and yet a comely countenance is a gift from the Lord, and while we must not foolishly admire ourselves, still a just self-esteem harms nobody.

Mr. Morgan's Princely Gift.

AMONG the many large donations by wealthy Americans to benevolent objects, the gift of $1,000,000, by Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, the well-known New York banker, is one of the grandest recently recorded. He has placed this sum at the disposal of the Society of the Lying-in Hospital of New York City, for the purpose of erecting a new building. At a recent meeting of the Board of Governors of the hospital, Mr. William A. Duer, the president, read a letter from Mr. Morgan containing the offer and conditions, in which he said he thought the society needed a new building, and that he had recently had an architect at work on plans.

The conditions are that the hospital shall have sufficient income from endowment or other sources to meet its expenses, and that the plans be satisfactory, from a medical point of view, to Dr. James W. Markoe, chief of the medical staff. Five young physicians have been traveling abroad to examine the best points of similar institutions, their traveling expenses being met by Mr. Morgan. The proposed building is to be a large ten-story structure, of granite and brick. The frontage on Second avenue will be 184 feet, and on Seventeenth street 83 feet. Our illustration shows the plan of the structure as proposed by Mr. Morgan's architect. Besides this splendid gift, Mr. Morgan has made many magnificent donations to other charitable and educational institutions.

The Mysteries of Chinese.

John Wesley is said to have once ventured the assertion that the Chinese language was the invention of the Evil One to keep the missionaries out of China. It has not succeeded in keeping them out, but it has made their work very difficult. Dr. J. F. Masters, one of the few foreigners who have mastered the language, tells of a missionary who was explaining the goodness of the Heavenly Father. The word for heavenly is "teen" with an aspirate on the vowels. The missionary left out the aspirate, with the result that the word meant "crazy." After Dr. Masters had studied Cantonese a few months he endeavored to preach a sermon. He wrote it out carefully, but made so many blunders in tones, vowel quantities and aspirates that some of the Chinese remarked how much the English language resembled the Chinese. They supposed that he was preaching in English. On another occasion he meant to order a roast chicken, and told his cook to go off and set fire to the street. The Chinese language has 14,700 characters in the standard dictionary. There are, moreover, 700 distinct sounds, to each of which is attached a sort of metrical scale, ranging from an octave to an octave and a half, giving a variety of tone which only a musical ear can detect. The tone is all important. For instance the sound "stung" may mean grasshopper, oar, elephant, mechanic, or pickles, according to the tone. Put an aspirate into the middle of the word and it may mean examine, good luck, wall, spear or gun, and a variety of other meanings, depending on the tone given. A man is a man only when the correct tone is given. Change the tones and the man becomes a nightingale, a carrot, and many other ridiculous things.

Drawn to Christ by Music.

In the varied experience of missionary workers in foreign lands it sometimes happens that the strangest means are made instrumental in opening up a way for the Gospel message where before, the barriers had been seemingly impassable. An instance of this character is related by a missionary laboring in Brazil. Four or five years ago there came to the little village of Serra Azul (on a ridge of the Blue Mountains) a Christian dentist, Senor Jose B. Nunez, and his wife. They felt deeply the spiritual wants of the people. Mr. Nunez and his wife used to pray day and night that the Lord might open a door before them. He was not gifted with 'tongues,' and could hardly speak to those around him about Jesus Christ; but he took his violin and began to play and sing the songs of Zion. In a short while the whole neighborhood came to hear them sing, and everybody liked the 'ballade,' as they called it. They noticed the words 'God,' 'Christ,' 'salvation,' etc., and inquired about their meaning. The door was open and a regular evangelical work began among that people who had never even heard about the Gospel.

Build Health

Build up your health by properly nourishing every part of your system with pure, rich blood. Only in this way can you gain strength of nerves and muscles. The wonderful building-up effect of Hood's Sarsaparilla makes it especially valuable after serious illness and also to prevent pneumonia, bronchitis, coughs, colds, fevers.

A Prominent Physician Writes.

SPOTSWOOD, N. J., Aug. 3, 1896.
Messrs. McKesson & Robbins:
Dear Sirs: Please send me, by mail, four more bottles of Tartaric Acid Tablets (10 each.)

I will also here state, in justice, that this is the most welcome remedy that has come into my hands since my beginning of the practice of medicine. It has given me, in every case of rheumatism in which I have used it, the happiest kind of results. I have used discretion, perhaps even more than necessary, in its employment, that it be given to patients whom I believe required such a remedy or preparation; but these are just the kind that refuse to yield to ordinary treatment, old chronic cases of gout, diathesis, where there is a tendency to calcareous deposits, etc. These are undoubtedly, or have been, at least to me, the most troublesome patients in my practice to give who might fairly be termed good results. No these have been the very kind in which I have been using Tartaric Acid with the very happiest results to patients and myself. Many valuable remedies come daily to our aid, but this has been the most welcome one to me thus far.

Yours very truly,

Requests for Prayer.

AT the Converts' Sunday Evening Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission, prayer was offered on Jan. 10, in accordance with the requests of many persons, among whom the following ask the prayers of our readers:

For the Conversion of Relatives and Friends.—Sorrowing Mother, New York City, begs that Christian friends will join her in praying for the conversion of her son who has fallen under the power of strong drink.—Anxious Sister, Janesville, Wis., that a brother and sister who are leading good moral lives, but are indifferent to religion, may realize their need of a Saviour and give themselves to Christ.—Anxious Mother, New York, that her son who is striving in his own strength to overcome his propensity to intoxicating liquor, may go to Christ for power and be saved.—J. L. R., Newberry, Pa., that God in mercy would look upon a wayward son and bring him into his fold.—Reader, Pa., that her husband and daughter might be saved, and that her husband may be emancipated from his bondage to an insidious drug.—Anxious Wife, Halsey, N. Y., for the conversion of her husband, two sons, a daughter and daughter-in-law.—L. E. S., Washington, D. C., for the conversion of her husband and herself.—Reader, Danville, Ill., for the conversion of two young men, a husband and a son, that they may be separated from evil and renewed in their hearts and lives.—Mother, Rockport, that God would save her son, who is kind and good, but is going to places of amusement which are liable to lead him into temptation; also for two other sons for whose conversion prayer is continually offered.—Believer, Spencer, Ia., that three sons who are unbelievers might be led to Christ, and that one of them who is struggling to escape from his bondage to drink might receive the help he needs.—J. J., New Lisbon, N. V., that a man who has fallen under the power of the intoxicating cup may be delivered and made a new creature in Christ.—Anxious Mother in Ohio, that her children might become children of God.—Reader, for the conversion of a dear brother who has fallen under evil influences and is leading a sinful life, and that he may be cured of his infatuation and become pure in heart.—Subscriber, Cosmopolis, Wash., that two business men of good moral character may see their need of Christ as a Saviour and give themselves to him; also that a neighbor who once professed to be a follower of Christ may return to the Saviour and ask of him pardon and atrength.—M. E. L., Glens Falls, N. Y., for the conversion of a son and his wife and children.—L. M. B., Michigan City, Ind., that a young man whose fondness for intoxicating liquor is increasing, may turn from it and seek the Lord.—L. H., Rosalia, Wash., for the salvation of a daughter, a son, and a son-in-law, that they may all give their hearts to God.—Mother, Roulette, Pa., that her husband and sons who are men of good moral character may realize their need of a Saviour and commit their souls to Christ.—Reader, Galveston, Texas, that a dear friend for whose conversion his mother has been praying for many years, may turn to the Lord; also for the conversion of an uncle and a brother.—"Sister in Christ," Hubbard, Minn., that a dearly loved son and his wife might give themselves to Christ and have grace to train up their children aright.—Reader, Columbia, O., that a man and his wife who are backsliders and are far from God through grievous sins, may be renewed and restored to the joy of salvation.—Sister, Fiatt, Ill., for the conversion of a dear sister and her husband who are in sore trouble and do not realize that they need salvation from sin.—Praying Mother, Washington, D. C., that two brothers who are without Christ may be aroused to a sense of their need and made true Christians.—Mother, Deland, Fla., for a son who is lying-sick in a distant city, that it may please the Lord to heal him, but more especially that his heart may be changed and he be fitted for Christ's kingdom.—M. N., Manawa, Wis., that a father may be led to feel his need of Christ and may give his heart to God, and that a mother may be enabled to rest more completely in the promises of God who is able to supply all her need.—Sorrowing Wife, St. Louis, Mo., that God would look upon her husband who has fallen under the power of intoxicating drink, and would deliver him and make him a true Christian; also that two infidels, who were once professing Christians, might be convinced of the truth and converted.—Anxious Wife, Willingford, Vt., for the conversion of her husband who has relapsed into drinking habits after reforming.—Mother, Vicksburg, Miss., for the conversion of her two sons who are far from God.—Anxious Mother, Hodge, Mo., for the conversion of husband and son.—Reader, Blackburn, Mo., that a brother who is a Sabbath-breaker may turn from his evil ways and seek the Lord.—Distressed Father, Brooklyn, N. Y., that his son who has been a source of misery for years, may be changed by the Holy Spirit. Only the almighty power of God can deliver him.—Widowed Mother, Dover, Minn., for the salvation of an only son and his wife, and that an impending sorrow may be averted.—Sorrowing Mother, Mineral, Tex., that her dear son who is in prison may be converted, and that the Governor of the State may be inclined to grant the petition now in his hands for his pardon.—Sad Wife, Fairbanks, Fla., for her husband's conversion and that he may return to his family a new creature in Christ, and be able to provide for them and the aged father who grieves over his son's conduct.

For the Restoration of Health.—Believer, Sherman, Tex., begs for prayers, that she may be fully restored to health that she may care for the loved ones depending on her; that a dreadful disease, of which she fears she is the victim, may not prey upon her, and that her faith in Christ may be strengthened.—Sorrowing Husband, Burlington, N. J., that his dear wife may be raised from her bed of sickness and recover her lost health.—Believer, Barton Landing, Vt., that an only daughter suffering from spinal disease may be healed.—V. B., Buffalo, Va., that a dear friend suffering from throat trouble may be cured.—Mother, Riverside, Pa., for the recovery of a dear daughter who is a poor invalid.—M. R., New York, for the recovery of a young man who is very ill.—Reader, Galveston, Tex., that her dear sick mother may be restored to health.—I. S., Maxwell, Ont., that a poor orphan who is sick may be raised up by the power of the Lord.—Reader, Danville, Ill., for the recovery of a neighbor who is ill with diphtheria, and that an afflicted, motherless boy who is suffering may be healed.—Believer, Delhi, that a dear son may receive healing in soul and body. The following persons also ask that prayer may be offered to the Great Physician for healing of the diseases from which they are suffering: Hopeful, Eohan, Tex.; Suffering Invalid, Baltimore, Md.; Reader, Dayton, O.; Mother, Vicksburg, Miss.; Believer, Hodge, Mo.

For Special Blessings.—F. E. B., Stockton, Minn., asks prayer for deliverance in a sore strait. Her husband cannot get pay for work done and their six little children are in sore need.—Widow in Arkansas, that property of the use of which she has been deprived, may be restored to her.—Reader, Titusville, Pa., for help in a severe financial trouble and for strength to resist temptation.—M. E. G., Philadelphia, Pa., that a family suddenly deprived of income may be delivered from sickness and poverty.—Believer in Virginia, that God will help and support a family in a very dark hour.—Friend, Lovell's Station, Pa., that God would interpose to save a family from being defrauded.—Reader, Philadelphia, that a young man in need of God's guidance may be kept from all evil and restored to those who are longing for his return.—Mother, Newark, N. J., that God would lift the cloud from the mind of her son and renew his faith in God and deliver him from the evil thoughts that are distressing him.—Sister in Christ, Indianapolis, Ind., that a young man who is in sore trouble may be enabled to find employment and may be speedily restored to his family.—Subscriber, Lake City, Minn., who is indistressing financial trouble, and in danger of losing the savings of many years of hard work, that God would send deliverance.—Praying Mother, New York, that a man who has lost his livelihood through the greed and dishonesty of others may find a way of providing for his family.—"Widowed and Troubled," that God, who knows her need, would supply it out of his fulness.—Anxious, New York, that a designing, unscrupulous man who is trying to supplant another and deprive him of the means of living, may be protected and kept from losing his position.—Christian Brother, Baltimore, Md., who is in financial trouble end beset by strong temptation, that God would give him the grace and help he needs.—Reader, Wooster, Tex., that a dark cloud resting on her name through false accusations may be removed and the truth be known and she may be fully vindicated.

Free to all Readers.—The New Cure for Kidney and Bladder Diseases Rheumatism, etc.

As stated in the last issue the new botanical discovery, Alkavis, is proving a wonderful curative in all diseases caused by Uric acid in the blood, or disordered action of the Kidneys and urinary organs. The New York World publishes the remarkable case of Rev. A. C. Darling, minister of the gospel at North Constantia, New York, cured by Alkavis, when, as he says himself, he had lost faith in man and medicine, and was preparing himself for certain death. Similar testimony to this wonderful new remedy comes from others, including many ladies suffering from disorders peculiar to womanhood. The Church Kidney Cure Co., of No. 418 Fourth Avenue, New York, who so far are its only importers, are so anxious to prove its value that for the sake of introduction they will send a free treatment of Alkavis prepaid by mail to every reader of The Christian Herald who is a sufferer from any form of Kidney or Bladder disorder, Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Gravel, Pain in Back, Female Complaints, or other affliction due to improper action of the Kidneys or Urinary Organs. We advise all sufferers to send their names and address to the company, and receive the Alkavis free. To prove its wonderful curative powers, it is sent to you entirely free.

Church Debts

Very likely the Dorcas Society, the King's Daughters or the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor want funds to carry on their work this winter. Perhaps you have in contemplation a new organ or carpet for the Sunday-school, or possibly the Church debt is troubling you. We have a plan for providing money for any of these objects. Write us and we will tell you all about it.

CUBA'S LONG STRUGGLE.

Weyler's Recall Demanded in Madrid —Hopes of the Cuban Patriots.

CONTRARY to all official prognostications at Havana and Madrid, the Cuban war is no nearer an end than it was before the death of Maceo. Spain is becoming exhausted by her long and apparently fruitless struggles in Cuba and the Philippines, and the terrible drain on the nation's resources, both in men and money, is severely felt. Among the popu-ago, in the Ozark region, he writes, I saw a minister enjoy a most substantial handshaking. He had long believed in the potency of a cordial grasp to win men to the church, but though successful in winning souls he was less so in getting dollars. He owned a little farm and mortgaged it. The mortgages were falling due, but there was no prospect of paying them; but it did not bother him a bit; he shook hands more heartily than ever. "I have unbounded faith in handshaking to bring everything out right," he often said. At last came the day when the mortgages must be foreclosed, that would deprive him of the little home that sheltered his family. On the eve of that day a knock at the door of his house, which was a little way from the town, called him. When he opened the door, a crowd came in, and without saying a word, commenced shaking hands. He felt something cold in the palm of the first man, and when the hand was withdrawn it stuck to his own. "That is the most substantial shake I ever experienced," he said, as he held up a $5 gold piece.

But the next man then stepped up and a silver dollar was left in the preacher's palm. No one would say a word in explanation, but pressed in on him as fast as he could put the silver and bills into his pockets. The house was not large enough for the visitors, each one of whom deposited from $1 to $10 in the outstretched hand. Each left the moment his little errand was accomplished, and not a word could be had in explanation, except the last one, who, as he turned to go, remarked: "We wanted to play a little joke on you, and we have." The handshaking netted just $871. His home was saved and a neat balance was left besides.

THE CAPTAIN-GENERAL'S PALACE, HAVANA.

lace at Madrid and other leading cities, there is a growing opposition to the policy of Captain-General Weyler, and an agitation in favor of his recall, which is giving the Government considerable uneasiness. It would surprise no one to learn that a Cabinet crisis had been precipitated by the recent reverses in Cuba and the East. Meanwhile the Cuban insurgents have been making demonstrations almost at the very gates of Havana. Two thousand insurgents recently captured and fortified the important suburb of Arroyo Naranjo, seven miles from the capital, the Spanish garrison having surrendered without a blow. This bold stroke caused consternation in Weyler's camp and the Captain-General's palace in Havana was the scene of much consultation and planning with a view to checking the advance of the insurgents under Gen. Aguirre, who are in strong force a short distance from the capital. Last week, the Cubans destroyed a Spanish gun-boat.

General Weyler's declaration that he had pacified Pinar del Rio, and his subsequent relaxation of the stringent guard at several points on the trocha as unnecessary, seem to have been ill-advised, as the Cubans crossed the trocha as soon as the guard was relaxed, and no surrenders have taken place in the mountain districts. According to the latest advices, the patriot forces, under Gomez, were as active and as hopeful of success as ever.

Cable despatches indicate a disposition on the part of Spain to institute important reforms in Cuba on the pretext that the King, as a birthday gift, makes liberal concessions for the purpose of pacifying the island. These reforms, it is rumored, will include Cuban suffrage, a complete system of civil government, and such a tariff readjustment as will aid in restoring prosperity to the distracted island which, for many years, has been the scene of war and desolation bringing prostration to its industries and ruin to its people.

A Memorable Handshaking.

That there is a great deal of character evinced in the manner of handshaking, few will deny, but this incident, related by a venerable preacher in a Western State, probably affords a much more striking proof of the utility of handshaking as a means of expressing thought and feeling than can be readily found elsewhere: Years

Rheumatism usually attacks the back and shoulders; and the joints at the knees, ankles, and hands are sometimes affected. Hood's Sarsaparilla cures them, by purifying the blood.

THROAT TROUBLES. To allay the irritation that induces coughing, use Brown's Bronchial Troient. A simple and safe remedy.

Saving Armenia's Orphans.

Our Second Remittance of $1,000 to Oorfa — The Movement in Other Cities—Missionary Gates' Letter.

WHEN THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a few weeks ago, laid before its readers the sad story of the orphans of Oorfa, it was not with any expectation of being able to undertake any extensive work of rescue in that quarter. We then believed that if, with the co-operation of our readers we could aid the missionaries in their efforts to succor some few orphans among the multitudes of homeless and destitute waifs thrown upon the world since the recent massacres, much good might be accomplished. During the last few weeks, however, we have received from friends in all parts of the Union so many evidences of sympathy with and approval of this special work, that we are now led to hope that it may so develop that hundreds of these helpless little waifs may be reclaimed and placed in Christian hands under the care of Miss Corinna Shattuck, and her missionary associates at Oorfa, where there is very great need of such a work. Last week a second remittance of $1,000 was sent by cable from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund through the American Board, to Miss Shattuck at Oorfa, being $2,000 applied to that particular work thus far, and making with previous remittances and other disbursements for Armenian Relief, a total of $54,000 expended by the Fund up to the present time.

Letters from missionaries in the field indicate progress in the orphan relief movement at different points. At Aintab, Smyrna, Van, Harpoot, Malatia, Arabkir, and Egin there are large numbers of orphan boys and girls to be cared for—not less than 15,000 in the Harpoot field alone.

In a letter from Harpoot, Rev. Mr. Bates, of the American Mission there, says this grateful tribute to the readers of his journal for their aid in the relief work:

HARPOOT, TURKEY.

o "The Christian Herald:"

DEAR FRIEND:—At various times during the year we have received grants for relief of the destitute Armenians from you.* THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has labored so nobly to save the destitute that some acknowledgment due to you.

It seems to me that it is one of the striking achievements of the Christian world that it has saved the Armenian people from the destruction to which they seemed doomed. One year ago, the whole people were in extreme destitution. Thousands of families had been left without a bread-winner. The majority of the nation had lost their supplies of food laid by for the winter, their cooking utensils were gone, more than fifteen thousand houses had been burned in this region, and the remaining houses were left without doors and windows in many cases. The people had no beds, and only the scanty clothing in which they fled from their foes. Winter was at their doors. How could they face it! Some gave up the struggle and died simply from the shock of the terrible ordeal through which they had passed and lack of courage to face the future. Many others expected to die.

Just here, the help given through your efforts, and other like-minded Christian men and women came in. We dispensed the funds as fast as they came and kept the people alive. Again and again in visiting towns and villages, the people have said to me: "We should have died last winter had it not been for the help you sent us." As I left Arabkir, a poor old man followed me out of the city, calling out blessings on my head all the way, because we had kept him and his family alive. These blessings on to you, for they are

Have You Asthma in Any Form?

Medical Science at last reports a positive cure for Asthma in every form in the wonderful Kola Plant, a new botanical discovery found on the Congo River, West Africa. Its cures are really marvelous. Rev. J. L. Combs, of Martinsburg, W. Va., writes that he cured him of Asthma of fifty years' standing, and Hon. L. G. Clute, of Greeley, Iowa, testifies that for three years he had to sleep propped up in a chair, being unable to lie down night or day from Asthma. The Kola Plant cured him at once. To make the matter sure, these and hundreds of other cures are sworn to before a notary public. To prove to you beyond doubt its wonderful curative power, the Kola Importing Co., No. 1164 Broadway, New York, will send a large case of the Kola Compound free by mail to every reader of The Christian Herald who suffers from any form of Asthma. All they ask in return is that when cured yourself you will tell your neighbors about it. Send your name and address on a postal card, and they will send you a large case by mail free. It costs you nothing, and you should surely try it.

yours. Eighty thousand souls received help through us last year!

Now, the people have gathered a harvest since the event, but many of them had already mortgaged a great part of their crops to obtain food. Then the tax-gatherers gathered up the grain, sold it and the animals and the utensils and beds to pay the taxes. Creditors and tax-gatherers have left the people with food for one month or two months, and in many cases with no food at all, so that they are again in need of relief. A part of the population are now in distress; in some villages disease has broken out, and before the close of the winter thousands will be in a starving condition unless help reaches them.

We have hired two houses and are receiving orphan boys and girls. We have engaged two Christian families to care for them under the superintendence of our missionary ladies. The children attend our schools. The children come in a pitiable condition. Yesterday one little boy came who had been carried off by the Koords, and just now gained his freedom. His feet were tied up in rags in lieu of shoes and stockings. A little girl came in half frozen and sat up in a chair by the stove, warming her bare feet and numbed hands. A man came from one of the Palu villages, bringing the three children of his brother. He had left his own two children, that he might consign these orphans to our care. The land is full of such waifs. Where the children have a mother or near relative who can care for them, we give a little aid that they may be cared for by their own kindred. Some of those who have no one to care for them, we have sent to orphanages in Smyrna and Broosa, and now we are opening homes for others here. Twenty-five dollars will support, clothe, and educate a child one year.

Thanking you for your most praiseworthy efforts in this relief work, I remain,

C. F. GATES.

A GREAT FLORAL BARGAIN

BEAUTIFUL FLOWERS. FREE AS THE AIR. SIZE GREATLY REDUCED.

This remarkable bargain is made to introduce to new readers The Woman's World and Jenness Miller Monthly, a handsome woman's magazine of twenty-eight to thirty-six pages, one hundred and twelve to one hundred and forty-four long columns, finely illustrated and all original matter, long and short stories by the best authors, price $1.00 a year. For only $1.00, we will send our splendid magazine for a whole year and twenty-five large-size packets of seeds, not the half packets which some are offering, but full-size packets of the most beautiful, attractive and showy flowers. This grand collection will give you a WHOLE FLOWER GARDEN FOR ABSOLUTELY NOTHING. Think of it! You will have a garden of flowers that will be the envy of everybody in your neighborhood. The seeds are of the very best quality that money and science can produce, pure and fresh and tested, supplied to us by one of the leading seedsmen in the United States, and a grower whose name is known and celebrated the world over for fine seeds. They are put up in elegant colored lithographed bags, with full descriptions and complete instructions for planting and cultivating, so simple that every one is sure to succeed with them and have a magnificent display of flowers in the garden all Spring, Summer and Autumn, with a bounteous supply for cut flowers, bouquets and house decoration.

These are the seeds we give you

Sweet Alysium, Amaranthus, Aquilegia, Asters, Balsam, Eschscholtzia, Gaillardia, Horehorey, Moon Flower, Marvel of Peru, Mizoneite, Mimulus, Forget-me-not, Nasturtium or Tropaeolum Dwarf, Nasturtium, Toll, Giant Flowered Pansy, Petunia, Phlox, Poppy, Portulaca, Castor Oil Bean, Salvia, Stocks, Sweet Rocket, Canary Bird Flower, Giant Flowering Verbena, Zinnia, Mixed Sweet Peas, Blanche Ferry Sweet Peas, Emily Henderson Sweet Peas—one large full-size package of every variety named in this list. Each packet contains one variety of seeds only—they are not all mixed up in the manner in which some publishers advertise hundreds of varieties for a small sum, and send one packet of mixed seeds that you have to plant and wait until they grow to tell anything about what they are. You can refer to any seed catalogue and see how much it would cost you to buy these seeds—from 5 to 25 cents a packet.

OUR SEEDS GUARANTEED

Any packet of seeds which fails to give satisfaction, with proper attention, we will replace free of charge, for twelve months, and in every collection of seeds we will include, free, a packet of New Giant Marguerite Carnation, now offered for the first time, at regular price being 50 cents a packet. Four for $2.00. Get three friends to subscribe, sending their names to us with $3.00, and we will send the magazine for a year and a collection of seeds to each subscriber, and will send you the magazine for a year, and a collection of seeds in payment for your trouble. This offer is perfectly honest, and we will promptly return your money if you are not satisfied when seeds and magazine are received. This offer is made to meet competition in the magazine business, and we unhesitatingly state that it is the greatest bargain ever offered—and must be accepted without delay.

PIN MONEY FOR WOMEN

In every egg and chicken rightly produced and sold there is "pin money" for women. It is a fact that a large majority of the successful poultry and egg raisers are women. The money thus obtained buys many luxuries for mothers or helps to pay for the better education of their children. On the pursuits open to women none will yield her such a prompt return or large profit—if rightly located—as raising poultry or eggs for market. Fresh eggs, choice chickens for broilers, ducks for roasters, always bring a high price. The supply has never equaled the demand. Success is a matter of care and attention to details, fully explained in

The Greatest Introduction of the Century

THE CHINESE LANTERN Plant produces bright red fruits like a cherry, enclosed in transparent husks, globular shape, which makes a plant in bloom and fruit look like a bush covered with small CHINESE LANTERNS. Fruit is most delicious for eating, and when preserved is one of the most delicate desserts. For ornamental purposes when cut and dried it is truly novel. It retains its brilliancy for months. Elegant for pot plants as well as out of doors.

SEED 10 cents per packet; 3 for 25 cents. PLANTS 20 cents each; 3 for 50c.; $1.50 doz. FOR 30c. we will send 1 pkt. of Chinese Lantern seed and the following 10 Novelties

TRAVELING IN THE ORIENT.

The Patient Ass Still the Common Burden-bearer in Many Lands—His Usefulness and Good Qualities—His Place in Scripture History—Honored Above all the Brutes.

AMONG the domestic animals of the Orient, there is none more serviceable, or that performs a greater variety of duties for man, than the domestic ass. It is many times mentioned in Scripture, where it is dignified for its patience and humility, its strength and obedience, and honored by being made the bearer of prophets, princes, and kings, and even of the Saviour himself. Thus, although in some parts of the world, the ass is held in low estimation, and its name is a synonym of contempt, it is not so in Asia and Palestine. All through the East, the ass is valued for its good qualities, already mentioned. In traveling, it is usually preferred to the horse or camel by all who desire to ride smoothly and leisurely upon a sure-footed animal.

In a wild or even a half-domesticated state, the ass is high-spirited and swift. History informs us that King Cyrus of Persia had his cavalry mounted upon asses, and Strabo states that the Caramanians also rode into battle upon asses, while Herodotus declares that Hystaspes made use of them in a fight with the Scythian invaders. But it is not as a battle-steed that the ass has won the appreciation of the Orientals, but as an ally and co-laborer in the arts of peace. Whether drawing the plough, bearing a heavy burden of merchandise, or carrying its master on a journey (as shown in the illustration on this page), the ass is equally the faithful and humble servant of man. The working ass of the East is of small stature and usually of a dark, reddish color, stoutly built, with a good-sized, sagacious-looking head and well-developed ears. Its strength and endurance in proportion to its size are such as to sometimes excite astonishment among those unacquainted with the species. It is generally believed that the ass originally received its reputation for stupidity from the ancient Egyptians, who hated it and used it head and ears as the symbol of ignorance and obtuseness. Among the Romans it was also held in low regard, and this estimate was somewhat undeservedly perpetuated in Western Europe. In Spain, Italy, Malta, and elsewhere in Southern Europe, the ass is carefully bred and used, and sometimes brings a high price. In Arabia and Persia, it is so well-bred and valued so highly that the owner of one of these animals usually boasts of its pedigree. Throughout Syria it is the favorite family burden-bearer, and used for the saddle by ladies on account of its smooth and agreeable gait.

Almost every country shows a difference in the breed, the asses of Damascus having long bodies and ears (like that of our picture), while those of upper India are almost pigmies in comparison. On the Mesopotamian plains, in Persia, on the Indus and in the Punjab, great herds of asses, fleet of foot and graceful in shape, graze in summer, migrating at the change of the season. The Arabs and Persians esteem their flesh as a delicacy.

Although, as already shown, the ass has at times been used in war, it is in almost all the essential qualities of a battle-steed, the reverse of the horse. It was prophesied of Christ in Zech. 9, 9, and referred to in Matt. 21: 5, that the Saviour of the world should be "meek and sitting on an ass, and a colt, the foal of an ass." By this action Christ is supposed to have indicated the humble and peaceful nature of his kingdom.

Moreover, the ass was honored as the only member of the brute creation which, according to the Scripture record, was the subject of a miracle, when it was made instrumental in conveying a rebuke to the disobedient prophet. Besides, in a very large number of passages throughout the Bible, the ass is referred to as a type of patient, industrious, fidelity, of physical endurance, of humility and mildness, the bearer of gifts and gentle embassies, the family carrier (as it is to-day through a very large part of the East), and also as the possessor of many other excellent and serviceable qualities which ought to go far toward removing from the species the undeserved obloquy and contempt into which it has fallen.

OUR MAIL-BAG

Questions and Answers.

100. P. Shireanstown, Pa. How was the Christian name derived? Why do people now have not given Christian names when we read in the Bible of them having only one name?

The phrase "Christian name," means the name received in baptism. It is the "given name," the other or surname being the patronymic or father's family name. Because otherwise, it would be impossible to distinguish between individuals. In very ancient times, it is probable that a person bore but one name, but later, as population multiplied, some distinction became necessary and men came to be known as the son of so-and-so; thus "Simon, son of Jonas," or as belonging to a certain town or section thus "Saul of Tarsus." The history of the evolution of names is a great and complex one, and cannot be discussed at length within our limited space.

Subscriber's Daughter, Wisner, Neb. In a recent discussion I contended that there is a certain path laid out for every one from the moment of their birth. Do you think I am right?

It may be as you contend, although we do not see how you can know that it is so. It does not seem like God's usual way of dealing with men. If the path is laid out for us and we are compelled to travel on, there is no justice in holding us accountable for a course we cannot avoid. Your contention, if unqualified, appears to destroy human responsibility. Our own consciousness does not confirm it. We know perfectly well when a temptation is presented to us and we yield to it, that we might have resisted had we chosen to do so. It seems to us that God pays great respect to the freedom of the will. He does not compel us to be good. He warns us of the evil of sin, and encourages us to be good by the promise of happiness, but if we choose evil in spite of him, he does not prevent us, but waits for us to discover that our choice will lead to misery, and the moment we find it out and turn to him in sorrow, acknowledging that he was right, he receives us tenderly. He wishes us to choose the good by our own volition. Even in our worldly affairs we are not conscious of coercion if it is applied. You may be destined to go to Africa and spend your life in work there, but when the suggestion is made to you, do you not feel that it is open to you to accept it or decline it? Man makes his own destiny. It is that which raises him above the beast. He can distinguish between good and evil, and he can choose the one or the other.

11. M. Auburn, Ia. Do you think that Matt. 24:26 refers to secret societies such as Freemasons and Oddfellows?

No, Christ is telling his disciples that his coming will be unmistakable and will be seen by all on the earth, and that if people say that he has returned and is in the desert or a secret chamber they need not go to look for him, because he will not come in that way but with great glory. The secret societies, so far as we know anything of them, do not put forth any pretensions of the kind.

12. Reader, Baltimore, Md. Is it wise to continue to pray with a man who is thoroughly bad, if he has been one for years without any change, especially when brooding and worrying about it more for one for other things? Does a man ever come when it is best to let such men alone? Does God answer one's prayers for them?

The expression of your picture is a sad one and, unfortunately, too common; but if we follow the teachings of Christ we must continue to pray for him and try to see to the uttermost. Matt. 18:20. It is not demanded, however, that we should wreck our own lives in the effort, or make ourselves for effective service a waste that seems endless and hopeless. Because it may be that living such a life is the best and the case entirely in God's hands, and we are always remembering that our petitions, for man's extremity is God's opportunity and our conscience is our witness. Let us touch. He may quicken the dead.

13. Albany, Md. Are the articles on "Promises," published from week to week in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, written by Adventists? What is the purpose of the "Talks" or the "Lectures" on the Sabbath school of the Adventist?

1. They are written by persons who expect the Lord Jesus to return to the earth in person before the Millennium to reign upon the earth, and to that extent they are Adventist. Some of them are spiritual, some physical.

Others, some Congregationalists, and some like Mr. Moody, who holds that belief, belong to the Church generally, as they serve all denominations. 2. No, do not let any one scare you with any such nonsense. Such people used to harass Christ about his breaking the Sabbath, and they used to worry Paul about circumcision and meats offered to idols and other old relics of Judaism, but if you will study your New Testament carefully and prayerfully, you will see that it is for sin and unbelief, and not for neglect of antiquated observances, that God punishes men. Take the Apostle Paul's advice: "Let no man judge you in meat or in drink, or in respect of a holy day, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath." (Col. 2:16.)

Appropos of the relief movement for the orphans of Oorfa in Armenia, we take pleasure in publishing the following letter:

BRIDGETON, N. J.
I read of "Armenia's Helpless Orphans" in your issue of January 15th. Mamma and I will gladly send our mite of one dollar each toward their relief if you will kindly state in next week's paper exactly how to send money for that purpose and the correct address to which it should be sent. I am a poor girl, a student and lover of books; but I feel that this call and that of India's starving millions

THE FAMOUS MUIR GLACIER, IN GLACIER BAY, ALASKA.

Among the sights of Alaska, the Muir Glacier is one of the most wonderful. It gives the impression of a long, high cliff, shaped like the Palisades of the Hudson, but white, and 100 feet higher than Niagara. It advances five feet daily, and masses of ice break with the noise of cannon and fall into the bay.

demand of me a sacrifice of some of the books I was intending to purchase, it is the only thing in which I can sacrifice, for it is the only luxury I have. The movement for the founding of a Christian orphanage for the orphans of Armenia, especially appeals to me, and the question at once arises: "How can I render substantial assistance?" And then a plan flashes across my mind: Why cannot THE CHRISTIAN HERALD issue a call to its readers to know how many are willing to pledge themselves to give five cents a week, as long as the Lord prospers them, so that it is in their power to give it, toward the founding and maintaining of these orphanages, and how many are willing to pledge themselves to make an effort to get fifty or a hundred other people to pledge five cents weekly for the same purpose. LADIA C. WYNER.

Many of our readers may be disposed to follow this excellent practical suggestion. We shall be pleased to hear from them. All money for the orphans of Oorfa can be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and will be regularly remitted to Miss Corinna Shattuck, the missionary in charge of the work.

J. M. P. Tinslen, N. I. What is the highest peak on this continent?

The greatest elevation on this hemisphere is Mount Aconcagua, in the Andes. It is between 23,000 and 24,000 feet high and was lately climbed by Zurbriggen, a famous Swiss guide.

Allen W. M. Congie, Pa. Who was Melchisedec?

He was the right one King of Salem, who went forth to meet Abraham on his return from the defeat of the allied kings. He was also a priest of the Most High (see Gen. 14:18, 20; Heb. 7:2, and also Josephus' Antiquities, 1:10, 2). The statement that he was "without father, without mother, without descent," etc., simply implies that he was of plain, undistinguished parentage, and unknown antecedents. Josephus intimates that he discharged the priestly and regal functions among the people because of his eminence for holiness and justice. He was a priest of God by divine appointment and not after any order or following any predecessor, and so Christ is declared to have been a priest "after the order of Melchisedec."

Reader, Albany, N. Y. Is Dr. Klopsch the son-in-law of Rev. Dr. Talmage?

He is not.

Reader, Joppa, Md. Is it right for a person who does not feel himself a Christian, to teach a Bible class of grown scholars in Sabbath School?

Such teaching, however earnest or well meant, cannot be spiritually effective. The blind should not lead the blind. (Matt. 15:24). And one who has no spiritual light cannot enlighten others.

Anxious One, Milikin, Mich. 1. If a person commit the unpardonable sin, do you think he will ever again come under conviction? 2. Do you think it possible to mistake conviction for conversion? 3. Is yielding to temptation to break the Fourth Commandment a wilful sin in the sense described Heb. 10:26?

1. Possibly, but he would not be troubled about it. 2. Yes, it is possible, but he may soon be undeceived by his own consciousness. If he has not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his (Romans 8:9); if he is living the Christ life, loving every one and delighting to render service to any one who needs it, and is striving in all things to be more and more like Christ, though failing in some things and making slower progress than he desires, he has made

Some Premium Offers Withdrawn

[N order that we may reserve a sufficient number of these Premiums to meet the requirements of Renewing Subscribers, we find ourselves compelled, as far as New Subscribers are concerned, to withdraw the following three Premium propositions from this date:

- 1st. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year and the plain red under gold edged Bible at $2.
- 2d. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year and Margaret E. Sangster's "Home Life Made Beautiful" at $2.
- 3rd. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year and Marion Harland's "Home of the Bible" at $2.

These propositions are still available for present CHRISTIAN HERALD Subscribers renewing in course of the year, but we cannot fill orders from new Subscribers for any of these Premiums.

Premium Propositions Still Open.

Until further notice the following offers are open to both old and new Subscribers:

- 1st. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Library for 1897—ten beautiful and exceedingly useful volumes aggregating 3,200 pages, in a very handsome bookcase, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, for $3.
- 2d. The International Self-Pronouncing Teacher's Bible with red under gold edges, and thumb-indexed, silk-sewed and leather-lined, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, at $3; and, of course,
- 3rd. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD without any Premium for one year at $1.50.

How to Get Premiums Free.

We are frequently in receipt of communications from persons who desire to obtain our Premiums, but who cannot afford to pay for them, yet who would be willing to work up new subscribers in payment if such a proposition would commend itself to us.

Heretofore we have not thought well of entertaining such propositions, but to give the matter a fair test we will, during the month of February—and only during the month of February—permit such of our friends as desire to secure either the 1897 Library or a thumb-indexed Bible, to send us three annual subscriptions, Premium or non-Premium, and in return therefor we will present them free with their choice of an 1897 Library, ten volumes aggregating 3,200 pages and handsome book-case, or a Thumb-Indexed Leather-lined, silk-sewed, Self-Pronouncing Teacher's Bible, with red under gold edges.

Three to One.

Please bear in mind that it takes three subscribers, with or without Premium, to earn either one of the two Premiums mentioned, and that the offer will hold good only during the month of February.

It is almost needless to add that no commissions can be allowed under this or any other Premium offer.

We beg especially to direct the attention of all our friends who contemplate availing themselves of this opportunity to the fact that we cannot supply the plain-edged Bible, or "Home of the Bible," or "Home Life Made Beautiful," as has already been set forth in an announcement at the beginning of this article.

Mrs. John Freeman. Will you kindly inform me how I may obtain my premium books? When I renewed my subscription in September, I did not order any book as I did not understand how much I should remit more than the subscription price for the paper. I would like some of the books offered even though I must pay extra if they can yet be obtained.

By sending $2 extra, you can receive our Library for 1897, or a Leather-lined, Thumb-indexed Bible. These two are the only Premium offers still open.

Perplexed, Glendon, Ia. Do you not think instrumental music in church services is in accord with the will of God? Will you please give your opinion of the use of organs in divinity service?

Assuredly. Almost every instrument capable of producing musical sounds has been employed to advantage at different times in religious service. Among these instruments, the organ is the grandest and most effective. If music should be tributary to the general purpose of the service; but when it becomes the dominant feature, and the service is made more concert, the music is out of place, however fine or artistic the performance.

no mistake but has been born again. 3. No, it may not have been wilful sin; but if it should be, the same sacrifice avails. The writer of Hebrews simply says that there is no other, which we know. A good plan to escape self-torture is to do some work for Christ, helping some sick neighbor, or teaching a class in Sunday School, or some other act of self-denial and helpfulness.

P. F. R., Salem, W. Va. 1. By what authority were the headings of the chapters of the Bible inserted? 2. Is the Revised Version issued by any publisher in this country? 3. Is it probable that a Version containing the readings advocated by the American Committee will appear?

1. By the authority of translators or revisers. The Geneva New Testament published in 1557, had this quaint imprint: "The New Testament of our Lorde Jesus Christ, conferred diligently with the Orke and best approved translations. With the arguments, as well before the chapters as for every booke and epistle, also diversities of readings and most profitable annotations of all hard places." There was also at the end, what the translators called: "A perfect supputation of the yeres and time from Adam unto Christ." They have no authority and are in some cases misleading. 2. Thomas Nelson & Sons, Union Square, New York, are the American publishers. 3. Yes, an edition with the changes recommended by the American revisers incorporated in the text, is now issued in small volumes by Fords, Howard & Hulbert, New York, edited by Dr. Roswell D. Hitchcock.

INDIA'S TWIN HORRORS.

Famine and Plague Devastating the Stricken Districts—Heroic Missionaries Remaining at their Posts with the Dying People.

THE brief cable dispatches from India contain no encouraging news. Large sections of the country are in the grip of famine, and in Bombay the plague is spreading rapidly. In the statements issued by the English Government authorizing the opening of a relief fund the admission is are in touch with the people throughout India, and know personally the suffering in their districts. Dr. Stone thought that there could be no better medium of distribution than they would make, as they were well informed and anxious to relieve the suffering.

Confirmation of Dr. Stone's opinion of the urgency of the need of help comes from a Methodist missionary at Jabalpur, who writes: "Impending famine is an utterly inadequate term to apply to this calamity. Dire famine is not impending, but is here, and I am certain I am not exaggerating when I say that since the beginning of August 28,000 persons have died of starvation. In this district alone ninety thousand persons must perish unless speedy relief arrives, and this is only a small part of the area affected." In the face of such testimony it is a serious responsibility to withhold even for a single day the money so sorely needed.

The Plague.

The American Board has received a number of letters from its missionaries and correspondents in India relating to the plague and famine. The Rev. E. S. Hume of Bombay, who went to India in 1875, says: "Things have been going from bad to worse until the situation is most grave and even alarming. One third of the population of the city is said to have fled, and multitudes are still leaving. One of the railroads has put on six extra trains a day, and hundreds crowd about the municipal stations waiting for an opportunity to get away. At first the plague was confined to one ward of the city, but it has spread from place to place, until no section is free from the disease. So, too, all classes, including Europeans, have suffered from it. The published reports greatly underestimate the number of deaths, which is probably not less than two hundred or three hundred a day."

Rev. James L. Barton, D.D., Secretary of the Foreign Department of the American Board, says that, while the population of Bombay are leaving it, the missionaries remain in order to render assistance to the stricken people and by their presence to restore confidence in and impart courage to those who cannot get away. The plague has approached very near to the mission premises.

Major Edward J. Turner, an English army officer stationed at Bombay, who arrived at Tacoma, Wash., recently, on his way to England on a furlough, gives a graphic description of the horrors of the plague now devastating Bombay and other cities of India. He says: "The natives are so wasted by starvation that they have no power to resist the plague, but, panic-stricken, they fall a prey to the horrible death. In the outlying districts I found the bodies numerous in the roads. On the banks of the Ganges, where the ghats are all located, hundreds of bodies are lying waiting their turn to be burned. The ghats are small, raised burning piles made of stone. The victim is brought to the river if possible before death, that he may die by the sacred stream; then when he dies his body is dipped in the stream, taken out and laid on the ghat with a pile of wood under and above it, and is soon reduced to ashes, which are swept off into the river.

"The natives look upon the plague as a scourge of their gods that cannot be helped, and will not tolerate any interference with their religious rights. The situation is becoming alarming. The proposition is being seriously considered of setting fire to the entire native quarter of the city, as well as to the barracks of the native troops, in the hope of thereby burning out the contagion. I don't know what will be done, for the whole earth seems laden with the poison, and it is carried by rats and other vermin everywhere. Nothing except a furnace heat can purify the quarters where the plague has raged."

A graphic picture of what an epidemic of plague means, is conveyed in the following story, which must be one of scores of similar incidents: "A Hindoo clerk went to the 'burning ground' for the purpose of cremating the body of his father, who died of the plague. On his return he found that in the mean time his mother had sickened and died, while shortly afterward his wife was attacked, and in a few hours was dead also. The clerk himself and an uncle of his are now down with the disease."

From these terrible telegraphic mosaics some faint idea may be formed of the miseries now weighing on that devoted land. What will Christendom do? Will not American Christians authorize the men who are there preaching the Gospel of Christ to feed the starving and shelter the widows and orphans for His sake? A very small sum will keep one person alive until June when the crops can be harvested. But the missionaries have no funds available. Even the native Christian teachers are suffering and for these especially, prompt provision should be made. It would be a fearful reproach on Christianity if any native who has accepted Christianity, and has by so doing lost his standing and his claims on native friendship, should be left to starve. Any of our readers who are willing to render prompt help in the emergency, however small it may be, may send their contributions to this office, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will see that they are forwarded to the most needy districts.

The Champion Sunday Scholar

A Bright Kentucky Boy Who Has Missed Only Two Sundays in Nearly Ten Years, Claims the Honor.

ONE of the best pupils in the Methodist Church South Sunday School at Danville, Ky., is a bright boy named John C. Eastland, jr. He is now thirteen years old, and has been attending pupil was always to be found in his seat. Until quite lately his family lived several miles out in the suburbs, but John trudged to his class through rain or snow, and in all sorts of weather. What would ordinarily have kept children away, had no effect upon him. He seemed to take especial pride in punctual attendance, quite regardless of the weather.

Recently, the teachers and superintendent found, on comparing notes and examining records, that John, in a period of nine years and nine months, had only been twice absent. These "misses" were unavoidable; one day he was sick of measles, and on the other occasion he was kept at home by something equally beyond his control. Otherwise the record is a perfect one, and it is asserted by his friends that it has probably no equal anywhere in Sunday School annals. They have claimed him to be the champion Sunday School pupil of America if not of the world. John is himself too modest to make this claim, but others do it for him, and are confident that the record cannot be equalled by any State in the Union. He has been going to Sunday School continuously since May, 1887, and he intends to keep on going until he has 1,000 consecutive attendances to his credit. John's portrait, from a photograph recently taken, is published on this page.

Another Kentucky boy, George Currin, of Lexington, is said to press young Eastland very closely for the honors of the record. George belongs to the Second Presbyterian Church Sunday School, of which Mr. J. R. Sharpe is superintendent, and the latter declares that George has missed only eleven attendances in twelve years. It is also claimed that Theodore Reuter, a boy of the same school, has made a record of 544 consecutive attendances while his sister, Lena, has nearly the same record, having missed but one attendance in ten years. They have thus nearly completed two of the courses of the International Sunday School lessons, each of which covers the whole of the Bible.

In view of the conflicting claims, it is difficult to decide who is really the champion Sunday School boy or girl of America. As there may be others who have phenomenal records, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD invites teachers and superintendents to send the names and attendance records of the best pupils in their schools, in order that the credit may be given where it belongs, and that the much discussed question of the championship may be definitely settled.

A FARMER'S ADVICE.

Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: Amos 5: 8. "Seek him that maketh the Seven Stars and Orion."

COUNTRY farmer wrote this text—Amos of Tekoa. He plowed the earth and threshed the grain by a new threshing-machine just invented, as formerly the cattle trod out the grain. He gathered the fruit of the sycamore-tree, and scarified it with an iron comb just before it was getting ripe, as it was necessary and customary in that way to take from it the bitterness. He was the son of a poor shepherd, and stuttered; but before the stammering rustic the Philistines, and Syrians, and Phœnicians, and Moabites, and Ammonites, and Edomites, and Israelites trembled.

Moses was a law-giver, Daniel was a prince, Isaiah a courtier, and David a king; but Amos, the author of my text, was a peasant, and, as might be supposed, nearly all his parallelisms are pastoral, his prophecy full of the odor of new-mown hay, and the rattle of locusts, and the rumble of carts with sheaves, and the roar of wild beasts devouring the flock while the shepherd came out in their defense. He watched the herds by day, and by night inhabited a booth made out of bushes, so that through these branches he could see the stars all night long, and was more familiar with them than we who have tight roofs to our houses, and hardly ever see the stars except among the tall brick chimneys of the great towns. But at seasons of the year when the herds were in special danger, he would stay out in the open field all through the darkness, his only shelter the curtain of the night-heaven with the stellar embroideries and silvered tassels of lunar light.

What a life of solitude, all alone with his herds! Poor Amos! And at twelve o'clock at night, hark to the wolf's bark, and the lion's roar, and the bear's growl, and the owl's te-whit te-who, and the serpent's hiss, as he unwittingly steps too near while moving through the thickets! So Amos, like other herdsmen, got the habit of studying the map of the heavens, because it was so much of the time spread out before him. He noticed some stars advancing and others receding. He associated their dawn and setting with certain seasons of the year. He had a poetic nature, and he read night by night, and month by month, and year by year, the poem of the constellations, divinely rhythmic. But two rosettes of stars especially attracted his attention while seated on the ground, or lying on his back under the open scroll of the midnight heavens—the Pleiades, or Seven Stars, and Orion. The former group this rustic prophet associated with the spring, as it rises about the first of May. The latter he associated with the winter, as it comes to the meridian in January. The Pleiades, or Seven Stars, connected with all sweetness and joy; Orion, the herald of the tempest. The ancients were the more apt to study the physiognomy and juxtaposition of the heavenly bodies, because they thought they had a special influence upon the earth; and perhaps they were right. If the moon every few hours lifts and lets down the tides of the Atlantic Ocean, and the electric storms in the sun, by all scientific admission, affected the earth, why not the stars have proportionate effect?

And there are some things which make me think that it may not have been all superstition which connected the movements and appearance of the heavenly bodies with great moral events on earth. Did not a meteor-run on evangelistic errand on the first Christmas night, and designate the rough cradle of our Lord? Did not the stars in their courses fight against Siseria? Was it merely coincidental that before the destruction of Jerusalem the moon was hidden for twelve consecutive nights? Did it merely happen so that a new star appeared in constellation Casseopeia, and then disappeared just before Charles IX. of France, who was responsible for St. Bartholomew massacre, died? Was it without significance that in the days of the Roman Emperor Justinian war and famine were preceded by the dimness of the sun, which for nearly a year gave no more light than the moon, although there were no clouds to obscure it?

Astrology, after all, may have been something more than a brilliant heathenism. No wonder that Amos of the text, having heard these two anthems of the stars, put down the stout rough staff of the herdsmen and took into his brown hand and cut and knotted fingers the pen of a prophet, and advised the recreant people of his time to return to God, saying: "Seek him that maketh the Seven Stars and Orion." This command, which Amos gave 785 years B. C., is just as appropriate for us 1897 A. D.

In the first place, Amos saw, as we must see, that the God who made the Pleiades and Orion must be the God of order. It was not so much a star here and a star there that impressed the inspired herdsmen, but seven in one group, and seven in the other group. He saw that night after night and season after season and decade after decade they had kept step of light, each one in its own place, a sister hood never clashing and never contesting precedence. From the time Hesiod called the Pleiades the "seven daughters of Atlas" and Virgil wrote in his Æneid of "Stormy Orion" until now, they have observed the order established for their coming and going; order written not in manuscript that may be pigeon-holed, but with the hand of the Almighty on the dome of the sky, so that all nations may read it. Order. Persistent order. Sublime order. Omnipotent order.

What a sedative to you and me, to whom communities and nations sometimes seem going pell-mell, and the world ruled by some fiend at hap-hazard, and in all directions maladministration! The God who keeps seven worlds in right circuit for six thousand years can certainly keep all the affairs of individuals and nations and continents in adjustment. We had not better fret much, for the peasant's argument of the text was right. If God can take care of the seven worlds of the Pleiades and the four chief worlds of Orion, he can probably take care of the one world we inhabit.

So I feel very much as my father felt one day when we were going to the country mill to get a grist ground, and I, a boy of seven years, sat in the back part of the wagon, and our yoke of oxen ran away with us and along a labyrinthine road through the woods, so that I thought every moment we would be dashed to pieces, and I made a terrible outcry of fright, and my father turned to me with a face perfectly calm, and said: "De Witt, what are you crying about? I guess we can ride as fast as the oxen can run." And, my hearers, why should we be affrighted and lose our equilibrium in the swift movement of worldly events, especially when we are assured that it is not a yoke of unbroken steers that are drawing us on, but that order and wise government are in the yoke?

In your occupation, your mission, your sphere, do the best you can, and then trust to God; and if things are all mixed and disquieting, and your brain is hot and your heart sick, get some one to go out with you into the starlight and point out to you the Pleiades, or, better than that, get into some observatory, and through the telescope see further than Amos with the naked eye could—namely, two hundred stars in the Pleiades, and that in what is called the sword of Orion there is a nebula computed to be two trillion two hundred thousand billions of times larger than the sun. Oh, be at peace with the God who made that and controls all that—the wheel of the constellations turning in the wheel of galaxies for thousands of years without the breaking of a cog or the slipping of a band or the snap of an axle. For your placidity and comfort through the Lord Jesus Christ I charge you, "Seek him that maketh the Seven Stars and Orion."

Again, Amos saw, as we must see, that the God who made these two groups of the text was the God of light. Amos saw that God was not satisfied with making one star, or two or three stars, but he makes seven; and having finished that group of worlds, makes another group—group after group. To the Pleiades he adds Orion. It seems that God likes light so well that he keeps making it. Only one Being in the universe knows the statistics of solar, lunar, stellar, meteoric creations, and that is the Creator himself. And they have all been lovingly christened, each one a name as distinct as the names of your children. "He telleth the number of the stars; he calleth them all by their names." The seven Pleiades had names given to them, and they are Alcyone, Merope, Celano, Electra, Sterope, Taygete, and Maia.

But think of the billions and trillions of daughters of starry light that God calls by name as they sweep by him with beaming brow and lustrous robe! So fond is God of light—natural light, moral light, spiritual light. Again and again is light harnessed for symbolization—Christ, the bright and morning star; evangelization, the day-break; the redemption of nations, Sun of Righteousness rising with healing in his wings. Oh, men and women, with so many sorrows and sins and perplexities, if you want light of comfort, light of pardon, light of goodness, in earnest prayer through Christ, "Seek him that maketh the Seven Stars and Orion."

Again, Amos saw, as we must see, that the God who made these two archipelagoes of stars must be an unchanging God. There had been no change in the stellar appearance in this herdsmen's life-time, and his father, a shepherd, reported to him that there had been no change in his life-time. And these two clusters hang over the celestial arbor now just as they were the first night that they shone on the Edenic bowers, the same as when the Egyptians built the Pyramids from the top of which to watch them, the same as when the Chaldeans calculated the eclipses, the same as when Elishu, according to the Book of Job, went out to study the aurora borealis, the same under Ptolemaic system and Copernican system, the same from Callisthenes to Pythagoras, and from Pythagoras to Herschel. Surely, a changeless God must have fashioned the Pleiades and Orion! Oh, what an anodyne amid the ups and downs of life, and the flux and reflux of the tides of prosperity, to know that we have a changeless God, "the same yesterday, to-day, and forever."

Nerxes garlanded and knighted the steersman of his boat in the morning, and hanged him in the evening of the same day. Fifty thousand people stood around the columns of the national capital, shouting themselves hoarse at the presidential inaugural, and in four months so great were the antipathies that a ruffian's pistol in Washington depot expressed the sentiment of many a disappointed office-seeker. The world sits in its chariot and drives tandem, and the horse ahead is Huzza, and the horse behind is Anathema. Lord Cobham, in King James' time, was applauded, and had thirty-five thousand dollars a year, but was afterward execrated, and lived on scraps stolen from the royal kitchen. Alexander the Great after death remained unburied for thirty days because no one would do the honor of shoveling him under. The Duke of Wellington refused to have his iron fence mended because it had been broken by an infuriated populace in some hour of political excitement, and he left it in ruins that men might learn what a fickle thing is human favor. "But the mercy of the Lord is from everlasting to everlasting to them that fear him, and his righteousness unto the children's children of such as keep his covenant, and to those who remember his commandments to do them." This moment "seek him that maketh the Seven Stars and Orion."

Again, Amos saw, as we must see, that the God who made these two beacons of the Oriental night sky, must be a God of love and kindly warning. The Pleiades rising in mid-sky said to all the herdsmen and shepherds and husbandmen: "Come out and enjoy the mild weather, and cultivate your gardens and fields." Orion, coming in winter, warned them to prepare for tempest. All navigation was regulated by these two constellations. The one said to shipmaster and crew: "Hoist sail for the sea, and gather merchandise from other lands." But Orion was the storm-signal, and said: "Reef sail, make things snug, or put into harbor, for the hurricanes are getting their wings out. As the Pleiades were the sweet evangels of the spring, Orion was the warning prophet of the winter.

Oh, now I get the best view of God I ever had! There are two sermons I never want to preach—the one that presents God so kind, so indulgent, so lenient, so imbecile that men may do what they will against him, and fracture his every law, and put the pry of their impertinence and rebellion under his throne, and while they are spitting in his face and stabbing at his heart, he takes them up in his arms and kisses their infuriated brow and cheek, saying, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven." The other kind of sermon I never want to preach is the one that represents God as all fire and torture and thunder-cloud, and with red-hot pitch-fork tossing the human race into paroxysms of infinite agony. The sermon that I am now preaching believes in a God of loving, kindly warning, the God of spring and winter, the God of the Pleiades and Orion.

You must remember that the winter is just as important as the spring. Let one winter pass without frost to kill vegetation and ice to find the rivers and snow to enrich our fields, and then you will have to enlarge your hospitals and your cemeteries. "A green Christmas makes a fat grave-yard," was the old proverb. Storms to purify the air. Thermometer at three degrees below zero to tone up the system. December and January just as important as May and June. I tell you we need the storms of life as much as we do the sunshine. There are more men ruined by prosperity than by adversity. If we had our own way in life, before this we would have been impersonations of selfishness and worldliness and disgusting sin, and puffed up until we would have been like Julius Caesar, who was made by sycophants to believe that he was divine, and the freckles on his face were said to be as the stars of the firmament.

One of the swiftest transatlantic voyagers made one summer by the Etruria was because she had a stormy wind abaft chasing her from New York to Liverpool

But to those going in the opposite direction the storm was a buffeting and a hindrance. It is a bad thing to have a storm ahead, pushing us back; but if we be God's children and aiming toward heaven, the storms of life will only chase us the sooner into the harbor. I am so glad to believe that the monsoons, typhoons, and mists, and siroccos of the land and sea are not unchained maniacs let loose upon the earth, but are under divine supervision! I am so glad that the God of the Seven Stars is also the God of Orion! It was out of Dante's suffering came the sublime Divina Commedia, and out of John Milton's blindness came Paradise Lost, and out of miserable infidel attack came the Bridgewater Treatise in favor of Christianity, and out of David's exile came the songs of consolation, and out of the sufferings of Christ came the possibility of the world's redemption, and out of your bereavement, your persecution, your poverty, your misfortunes, may yet come an eternal heaven.

Oh, what a mercy it is that in the text and all up and down the Bible God induces us to look out toward other worlds. Bible astronomy in Genesis, in Joshua, in Job, in the Psalms, in the prophets, major and minor, in St. John's Apocalypse, practically saying, "Worlds! worlds! worlds! Get ready for them!" We have a nice little world here that we stick to, as though losing that we lose all. We are afraid of falling off this little raft of a world. We are afraid that some meteoric iconoclast will some night smash it, and we want everything to revolve around it, and are disappointed when we find that it revolves around the sun instead of the sun revolving around it. What a fuss we make about this little bit of a world, its existence only a short time between two spasms, the paroxysm by which it was hurled from chaos into order, and the paroxysm of its demolition.

And I am glad that so many texts call us to look off to other worlds, many of them larger and grander and more resplendent. "Look there," says Job, "at Mazaroth and Arcturus and his sons!" "Look there," says St. John, "at the moon under Christ's feet!" "Look there," says Joshua, "at the sun standing still above Gibeon!" "Look there," says Moses, "at the sparkling firmament!" "Look there," says Amos, the herdsman, "at the Seven Stars and Orion!" Do not let us be so sad about those who shove off from this world under Christly pilotage. Do not let us be so agitated about our own going off this little barge or sloop or canal boat of a world to get on some "Great Eastern" of the heavens. Do not let us persist in wanting to stay in this barn, this shed, this out-house of a world, when all the King's palaces already occupied by many of our best friends are swinging wide open their gates to let us in.

When I read, "In my father's house are many mansions," I do not know but that each world is a room, and as many rooms as there are worlds, stellar stairs, stellar galleries, stellar hallways, stellar windows, stellar domes. How our departed friends must pity us shut up in these cramped apartments, tired if we walk fifteen miles, when they some morning, by one stroke of wing, can make circuit of the whole stellar system and be back in time for matins! Perhaps yonder twinkling constellation is the residence of the martyrs; that group of twelve luminaries may be the celestial home of the Apostles. Perhaps that steep of light is the dwelling-place of angels cherubic, seraphic, archangelic. A mansion with as many rooms as worlds, and all their windows illuminated for festivity.

Oh, how this widens and lifts and stimulates our expectation! How little it makes the present, and how stupendous it makes the future! How it consoles us about our pious dead, that instead of being boxed up and under the ground, have the range of as many rooms as there are worlds, and welcome everywhere, for it is the Father's house, in which there are many mansions!

Oh, Lord God of the Seven Stars and Orion, how can I endure the transport, the ecstasy, of such a vision! I must obey my text and seek him. I will seek him. I seek him now, for I call to mind that it is not the material universe that is most valuable, but the spiritual, and that each of us has a soul worth more than all the worlds which the inspired herdsman saw from his booth on the hills of Tekoa.

I had studied it before, but the Cathedral of Cologne, Germany, never impressed me as it did one summer. It is admittedly the grandest Gothic structure in the world, its foundation laid in 1248, only a few years ago completed. More than six hundred years in building. All Europe taxed for its construction. Its chapel of the Magi with precious stones enough to purchase a kingdom. Its chapel of St. Agnes with masterpieces of painting. Its spire springing five hundred and eleven feet into the heavens. Its stained glass the chorus of all rich colors. Statues encircling the pillars and encircling all. Statues above statues, until sculpture can do no more, but faints and falls back against carved stalls and down on pavements over which the kings and queens of the earth have walked to confessional. Nave and aisles and transept and portals combining the splendors of sunrise and sunset. Interlaced, interfoliated, intercolumned grandeur. As I stood outside, looking at the double range of flying buttresses and the forest of pinnacles, higher and higher and higher, until I almost reeled from dizziness, I exclaimed: "Great doxology in stone! Frozen prayer of many nations!" But while standing there I saw a poor man enter and put down his pack and kneel beside his burden on the hard floor of that cathedral. And tears of deep emotion came into my eyes, as I said to myself, "There is a soul worth more than all the material surroundings. That man will live after the last pinnacle has fallen, and not one stone of all that cathedral glory shall remain uncrumbled. He is now a Lazarus in rags and poverty and weariness, but immortal, and a son of the Lord God Almighty; and the prayer he now offers, though amid many superstitions, I believe God will hear; and among the Apostles whose sculptured forms stand in the surrounding niches he will at last be lifted, and into the presence of that Christ whose sufferings are represented by the crucifix before which he bows; and be raised in due time out of all his poverty into the glorious home built for him and built for us by 'Him who maketh the Seven Stars and Orion.'"

FIRST TO GO.

LOOK around on the loved ones.
By the fireside's ruddy glow,
And I ask my heart in a whisper,
Solemn and soft and low,
When the angel shall come to grieve us,
And one must surely leave us,
Who'll be the first to go?
Across death's darkened portal
Some step must flitting go,
Some face must lie in its shadow,
Some pulse must flutter low
When the angel shall come to grieve us,
And one must surely leave us,
Which one will have to go?
Of all that unseen glory
Some face will catch the glow,
Some heart find first the healing
Where the restful waters flow.
When the angel shall come to grieve us,
And one must surely leave us,
Who'll be the first to go?

"THE GOD OF SIX FACES."

Arumugam, a Famous Hindoo War Deity, his History, and Photograph.

IN the mail matter which came from overseas to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices in the Bible House, a few days ago, there was a small round tin box, bearing a lot of postal marks on the outer wrapping. It came from India. On opening it, a strange-looking carved object of silver, was seen, which, being examined, proved to be highly interesting and quite artistic as well. By the same mail came this letter from Rev. T. S. Taylor, a Christian pastor of Madura, India:

MADURA, Dec. 18, 1896.

I herewith send you a Hindoo god made of silver, and also the story of the god.

The name of the heathen deity is Arumugam, (aroo meaning, "six," and mugam, "faces.") He has, however, twenty-eight other names peculiar to himself. Arumugam, the Hindoo god is represented by an image with six heads and twelve arms. Because such an image is rather difficult to make, either of stone or metal, he is usually found in the pagodas with one head and four arms only, two of which he lifts up, holding with them the celebrated lance with which he slew the giant Sura, while the remaining two of his four hands are empty. On his head he wears a crown, and his ears, neck, breast, arms, hands, and his legs are adorned. His standing-place is a flower, to his right and left stand his two wives, and near him is a peacock—his ordinary vehicle.

Arumugam, the god of war, being fond of fortresses, mountains and hills, his principal pagodas are built on mountains, and during his festivals in the month of Kartika (October-November) bonfires are blazing in his honor throughout the land. To Arumugam various places are sacred among which the following are the most celebrated: 1. Tiruparankundram, some four miles south-west of Madura; 2. Pulni, seventy miles north-west of Madura; 3. Trichendoor in Tinnevely district, Nadars are the chief worshippers in the place; 4. Kathirkamam, in Ceylon. The King of Kandi has chosen him as his favorite god. The Mohammedans there call the god Kathir-nabi, and the Tamil people call him Kathirkamavelar. The god is said to have a continual headache, in consequence of which he has taken up his abode at Curallam, in Tinnevely district.

to cool his head at the water-fall near that place, where all sorts of sick people go in order to be cured by the god, who is supposed to be in sympathy with all sufferers.

Arumugam has two wives, viz.: Valliammai (jewel-matron), and Devanai (divine elephant). The image of the former is painted brown, and that of the latter yellow; but each is represented in a natural form with two arms and hands, holding in the left hand a lotus flower, while the right arm hangs down. When Arumugam had returned triumphant from the battle with the giant Sura, he married Devanai; afterward he married also Valliammai, who was born of a roe and brought up by basket-makers in a forest, where he found her. The office of both wives consists in giving children, in removing sickness and all sorts of trouble, in preventing evils from taking possession of men and women and in casting them out.

Polygamy is not frequent in South India; and usually, when a man marries a second wife, while his first one is still alive, it is because the latter is barren or has an incurable disease. Brahmins and Nadars are strictly prohibited by their caste rules from marrying a second wife while the first one is alive. Polygamy is frequent among Naicks, Reddys, and many low caste people among the heathen. "As is the god, so is the people."

The engraving on the silver gives an accurate representation of god Arumugam. Madura is unrivalled for the variety of its idols and emblems, not only in brass and copper, but in gold and silver images. The gold and silver images kept in private houses are worshipped daily. Some are used as ornaments and adorned on neck or breast. Nearly 3,000 years ago the folly of idolatry was shown in the Bible: "Their idols are silver and gold, the work of men's hands." Yours truly, T. S. TAYLOR.

The silver idol (shown in the photograph) is a piece of very delicate and curious workmanship. It has two holes in the projections at the top and one at the lower point, which would indicate that it has been kept in its place in some heathen temple, by cords or light chains. Doubtless it has been an object of worship and veneration through many generations.

A Buddhist Prayer-Wheel.

Students of Oriental theology know that, in many parts of the East, the wheel has a symbolic place in priestly rite and popular custom. An observant traveler in Tibet, Mr. William Simpson, who has recently returned to England from that country, succeeded in securing one of those peculiar machines, an illustration of which appears in this column. Tibet is a jealously-guarded country, but the plucky traveler crossed the frontier and penetrated to some of the Tibetan cities where he had facilities in the temples and elsewhere, for studying the working of the "sacred wheels."

Mr. Simpson came to the conclusion that the wheel and its accompanying customs are traceable to primitive sun-worship; the sun's motion is imitated in all the rites, which, to be effective, must be performed from left to right, and if that order be reversed, all the results of good deeds and previous prayers are cancelled.

The Distance of the Stars.

Few persons, even though they may casually read an astronomical article, have any idea of the vast and practically measureless distances that separate one star from another. Says a scientific writer in Self-Culture:

"One of the nearest of the stars is Sirius, the brilliant Dog-Star, which may be seen in the evening all through the winter months towards the south. How far away do you suppose that the Dog-Star is? Here are the figures as astronomers give them: To the sun, ninety-three million miles; to Sirius, six hundred thousand times as far. Multiply these two numbers together and you will get a number so large that I doubt if you will be able to read it without consulting the numeration table. And yet Sirius is a near star. Suppose that we had some means of journeying to the sun—some fairy chariot that would take us through empty space at the highest speed of a railroad train—and that we traveled continually both day and night. Long before we could reach the sun, even speeding through space at the rate of sixty miles an hour, we should die of old age, unless we carried with us the "elixir of youth," for the journey would take one hundred and seventy years. Now multiply this number by 600,000, and you will find that to travel to Sirius in the same conveyance would take us one hundred million years at least.

"There are several stars which are known to be fifteen or twenty times as far away as Sirius, and which still shine as stars of the second or even the first magnitude. How far away must be the thousands of little twinklers which we can barely see with the naked eye, and the millions of still fainter stars which are visible only through a telescope, we have no means of knowing, for astronomers have been unable thus far to carry their measurements beyond a certain distance."

MR. MOODY'S BIRTHDAY GIFT.

A Life of Useful Service in Both Hemispheres, Valued by the Church and Honored of God—How His Friends Propose to Celebrate the Day.

TWO days hence Mr. Moody will celebrate his sixtieth birthday. Multitudes of Christian people on both sides the Atlantic will join in wishing him many happy returns of the day. There are some whom the world can ill-afford to spare, and Mr. Moody is one of them. All over the world there are people who bless God for Mr. Moody's life. Some of them usual method of presenting a testimonial or making a handsome present was not available in this case, because it was very unlikely that Mr. Moody would accept it, and there was, besides, a well-grounded conviction that it is no use to give Mr. Moody money. He has the habit of indicating some treasurer or secretary who has charge of such matters, and will apply it to some enterprise which is needing funds. It was desired to make this token of appreciation a personal, and, if possible, a permanent matter. The form it was finally resolved to give to it was were led to Christ by the Holy Spirit's application of Mr. Moody's words to their hearts, and there are some whose loved ones were won for the Master by the same means. When one thinks of all the good that has flowed from Mr. Moody's labors during the past forty years, and of the good he is still doing, no birthday wish seems so appropriate as that with which the Babylonish courtiers approached the monarch: "O, King live forever!" Perhaps it may seem selfish to express such a wish about a man who is serving us well, and has a long record of service behind him; but this is a selfish world and there is no pretense of disinterestedness in wishing an indefinite prolongation of such a fruitful life as Mr. Moody's. Our country and our time needs such a man who, in the spirit and power of Elijah, is warning men of their sins and the consequences of them, and without fear and favor is denouncing hypocrisy and formalism.

Mr. Moody's message reaches home, for it is never "a bow drawn at a venture," but a well-aimed shaft at a well-considered mark. Much work still remains for him to do, and he has the heart and the will to do it. We would therefore keep him on this side the stream as long as possible, for our own sake. For his, he doubtless feels as the Apostle Paul did, that to depart would be far better; but the delay will not count with a man to whom belongs in a marked degree the assurance of the prophet: "They that turn man to righteousness shall shine as the stars forever and ever."

Two months ago Mr. Moody's many friends in England took note of the fact that his sixtieth birthday was approaching, and considered how it could be most appropriately celebrated. It was felt that the occasion should not be allowed to pass without some sign that the Christian world appreciates the distinguished services that Mr. Moody has rendered. The one that will be sure to have Mr. Moody's approval. It is proposed to raise a fund for the completion of the Northfield chain of buildings by the erection of a chapel for use in the annual conferences. Already there are nearly fifty buildings of one kind or another at Mount Hermon and Northfield, but the educational and training work carried on there and the influx of extra visitors to the summer conferences have passed beyond the capacity of the various houses. One or more buildings are urgently needed, and particularly a chapel for summer use. This Mr. Moody's friends in England, with the assistance of any American friends who desire to contribute, propose to erect, as a birthday gift to Northfield, which is Mr. Moody in a corporate capacity. A notice of the project was published several months ago, over the signatures of Lord Kennaird, Rev. H. W. Webb-Peplow and Rev. F. B. Meyer, and subscriptions were invited from all "who love Mr. Moody and are under lasting obligations for his written and spoken words." Since that time subscriptions have been flowing in and there is little doubt that the sum required will be ready by the day appointed.

On this page we give pictures of some of the existing Northfield buildings, of which a description appeared in this journal on December 30, 1896. With these is a picture of Mr. Moody's library, and of the old Moody Homestead, which is rendered sacred in the memory of the great Evangelist by a host of pathetic memories. We also give a reproduction of a picture of the Moody family group which was taken in 1862, when Mr. Moody was twenty-five years old. No woman was ever more loved and honored by a son than was Mrs. Betsey Holton Moody, who occupies the centre of the group. She died only last year, and her son speaking tenderly of her said: "It is a great honor to be the son of such a mother. I do not know where to begin; I could not praise her enough. In the first place my mother was a very wise woman. In one sense she was wiser than Solomon; she knew how to bring up her children. She had nine children, and they all loved their home. She won their hearts, their affections; she could do anything with them."

"Whenever I wanted real sound counsel I used to go to my mother. She so bound her children to her that it was a great calamity to have to leave home. I had two brothers that lived in Kansas and died there. Their great longing was to get back to their mother. My brother who died in Kansas a short time ago, had been looking over the Greenfield papers

And Cornelia, she was her first girl; she could not get along without Cornelia, for she had to take care of the twins. And

NORTHFIELD IN WINTER.

George—she couldn't live without George. What could she ever have done without George? He stayed by her through thick and thin. She couldn't live without George. And Edwin, he bore the name of her husband. And Dwight—I don't know what she thought of him. And Luther, he was the dearest of all, because he had to go away to live. He was always homesick to get back to mother. And Warren, he was the youngest when father died; it seemed as if he was dearer than all the rest. And Sam and Lizzie, the twins, they were the light of her great sorrow."

Mr. Moody's picture of his early days is a very vivid one. They were days of heroic struggle for the patient brave mother, who toiled day and night for the support of her fatherless children. Her husband's death left her absolutely penniless. The neighbors urged her to apprentice her boys, but she was determined to bring them up herself. "Well," they would say, "you know one woman cannot bring up seven boys; they will turn up in jail, or with a rope around their necks." "She toiled on," Mr. Moody says, "and none of us went to jail, and none of us had a rope around his neck. And if everyone had a mother like that mother, there would be no need for jails."

"I remember the first thing I did to earn money was to turn the neighbors' cows up on Strowbridge Mountain. It went into the common treasury. And I remember when George got work we asked who was going to milk the cows. Mother said she would milk. She also made our clothes, and wove the cloth, and spun the yarn, and darned our stockings; and there was never in all those years, any complaining."

"That dear face! There was no sweeter face on earth. When I got within fifty miles of home I always grew restless, and walked up and down the car. For sixty-eight years she has lived on that hill, and when I came back after dark I always looked to see the light in mother's window. When I got home on the Saturday night she died. I was so glad I got back in time to be recognized. I said, 'Mother, do you know me?' She said, 'I guess I do.' I like that word, that Yankee word, 'guess.' The children were all with her when she was taking her departure. At last I called, 'Mother! mother!' No answer. She had fallen asleep; but I shall call her again by-and-bye."

"Now I have got the old Bible—the family Bible—it all came from that book. That is about the only book we had in the house when father died, and out of that book she taught us. And if my mother has been a blessing to this world, it is because she drank at this fountain."

"Now, there was another thing about my mother—she never turned away any poor from her home. There was one time we got down to less than a loaf of bread. Someone came along hungry, and she said, 'Now, children, shall I cut your Christian Education the True Remedy—The Duty of the Church and People of Wealth—The Educational Outlook.

ANYONE following the facts and considerations in these letters, has asked, What is the remedy? Is this fatal, spiritual poison to have free, unrestricted and supreme sway in Utah, and thence to go forth to poison all parts of our land, corrupting patriotism, and destroying Christian life? Non-Mormons near the seat of its power are anxious. They know the old saying that "What has been may be," and have visions of the return of the day when some one in Brigham Young's place may declare, as he once did, "I will unsheathe my bow-knife." They remember from 1850 on, the civil territorial government was hardly more than a convenience for carrying out the plans of the church, and ask, "Can it be possible that the State of Utah is, ever in the future, in the same way to become only a convenience for carrying out the decrees of its leaders, their intolerance and proscription in business and social life, under the guise of religious zeal. Must all officers be Mormons, from the governor down, through every grade in the state, counties and cities? Must all but Mormon teachers be driven out from all places of instruction from the university to the kindergarten? Every American and Christian sentiment protests that this must not be. There is a remedy, and it must be found. The changes which have already been wrought point to that remedy. What has been done to set the people free must be strengthened in every part; the press must use its constitutional freedom and be outspoken; the personal rights of the people must be freely and universally discussed that they may understand clearly when any deception or tyranny is attempted. The public school system and other means of public instruction must be vigorously maintained; railroads, mining, improvements in tilling the soil and all forms of business enterprises must be encouraged, together with the immigration of non-Mormons. But the greatest and most powerful remedy, and the one upon which the efficacy of all others will depend, is Christian education. What Christian schools and churches have done under all the trying conditions of the past should be repeated and multiplied. Our entire country must wake up and wherever Mormonism is preached and Mormon fanaticism encouraged, the truth must be presented and Mormon errors exposed and people saved from its delusions. People of wealth must see that just so far as Mormonism is established and propagated, it imperils all that they hold dear, and threatens attack upon every dollar of their property. They must be willing to give of their means for the support and efficiency of all measures to resist its doctrines. In every part of Utah mission schools should be sustained, that all who desire distinctively religious instruction may find it within their reach. There should be high schools and academies well endowed, with improved appliances and the best of teachers, favorably located in different parts of the state, for the admission of those who may seek faithful religious training of this grade. This must be crowned with ample college opportunities open both to men and women. These will be naturally located at Salt Lake City. This accords with the plan in other states where there is no organization directed in secret, alike against Christianity and the freedom of religious belief guaranteed every American. It accords also with the American theory of education which brings the religious and state education into competition, thus each stimulating the other to the best results. The state educates to guarantee its own existence; it makes education universal that all may have the degree of intelligence necessary to discharge their civil duties. It establishes higher and university instruction that there may be assured opportunity for the advanced training of those who are to be its officers and who need the utmost intelligence for the wisest direction of its affairs. In this education by civil authority the state does not antagonize Christianity because the state is founded in Christianity, nay, the state itself is Christian according to the greatest thinkers, such as Daniel Webster, and according to the delic schools or in other grades of instruction under the direction of the state. The Presbyterians are favorably situated for the carrying out of a complete plan of education in Utah. For more than a score of years they have steadily advanced the work of their schools under the Woman's Executive Committee. It is stated that "30,000 boys and girls have passed under the influence and instruction of their teachers in Utah." They have four academies well distributed and favorably located in the state; the one at Salt Lake City of advanced grade doing preparatory college work. In their churches in Mormon communities they report a total membership of 1,601. Their Sabbath School enrollment reaches 3,984 and the attendance on their schools and academies over 2,500. What a flood of light have these schools let in upon Mormon life! Not a few have gone up through them to the discharge of large responsibilities. In them were so far trained two of the efficient pastors of churches in Utah. Many have become effective teachers in mission and public schools. The great step forward necessary to preserve what has been done and to complete and crown the work of this church for the future is suggested and urged by the gift of $50,000 by Dr. Sheldon Jackson toward the establishment of a college at Salt Lake City to be open alike to men and women; in which the Bible is always to be taught; and which as a guarantee of its unvarying adherence to Christian instruction is to be under the direction of the Presbyterian Church (while other denominations are represented in its faculty and on its Board of Trustees)—also conditioned on the gift by the citizens of a site of not less than fifty acres. Eighty acres have been given, providing one of the most beautiful sites, half mile outside of the city, together with lands where those dependent on their own efforts may find opportunities for productive labor. In connection with the gift a careful survey churches and schools in the vast region lying between Canada and Mexico. He was the first Presbyterian missionary in Utah and had kept carefully in mind the progress of events and appropriately timed his gift. There have been many assurances of interest and co-operation, which it is expected will materialize in due time in ample funds. Some are specially interested that one who has given his life to Home Missions and experienced all their hardships, should, when by inheritance, careful savings and wise investments, he finds himself in possession of a small surplus, give it for the founding of a Christian college. A similar use of property on the part of all wealthy persons would answer every call for the necessities of Christian education and Christian missions. As illustrating the diverse interest manifested it may be stated that the missionary on St. Lawrence Island in Bering Sea who can communicate with the world only once a year, directed that twenty-five dollars of his salary be reserved in aid of the college. A lady resident of the Hawaiian Islands wrote expressing her idea of the "urgent need" for the college and enclosed her check for $100. Another lady who had been neither seen or addressed by any one connected with the movement offered $500. By as much as woman has been degraded in Utah, by so much the college appeals to her sisters everywhere.

Youthful Consecration.

Greater than all other influences combined, is that exercised upon the life and destiny of a child by the example and teachings of its mother. When Gertrude Howe, a missionary to China, gave her heart to Christ, she promised to go to a foreign field. She kept it a secret, however, till the evening of her return from school. She prayed all day for strength to break the matter to her mother. In the twilight the mother sat rocking contentedly for a few minutes, thinking possibly that there was less need of haste now that the young hands could take hold of house affairs once more. Gertrude knelt down beside the little rocker, and laid her diploma in her mother's lap.

"Mother," she said, "I have something to tell you that I am afraid will hurt you. I know how hard you have worked to help me through school; but I cannot stay with you now that it is all over. I promised the Lord, when he forgave me my sins, that I would go to China to teach the heathen."

cisions of the Supreme Court. The destruction of Christianity among us would destroy the American state. But the state deals with the duties of time, the church educates for eternity, for the salvation of souls here and hereafter. The two spheres of education are broadly distinguished, but in perfect harmony. The church, as the representative of all Christian believers, is charged with the preservation of the Divine oracles and of the dissemination of their teachings among men. All Christian churches should rally to this work in Utah. In their own good time they will have colleges representative of their own beliefs as they have in other states. Some of them have, as I think, unwisely reduced their educational work. The Congregational body are endeavoring to make theirs more efficient by concentrating it upon a college. All should go forward in harmony, each working according to its plans. The Mormons will lack no unity of effort. In the public schools of the state the largest number in attendance are Mormons, as are the larger body of the teachers from the kindergarten to the State Normal School, Agricultural College, and State University. Their religious views, as I indicated in my first letter, have the same standing before our national constitution as those of Christian believers. The most that we can expect of them is that they shall not teach Mormonism, that they shall not promote the destruction of Christianity, as we neither expect nor allow Presbyterians, Methodists, Baptists, Lutherans, or other sects to teach their denominational views in pub-

In connection with the gift a careful survey of the educational aspirations in the territory. The State Normal School is well attended, the Agricultural College has an attendance of 250 and the State University of 500. Provo Academy, an institution under the direction of the Mormon church, reports a still larger number. This institution has theological instruction throughout its courses. The students board among the citizens of the place. The town is districted and young men of promise and marked ability are charged with the spiritual care of the students in each district. It was found that fifty-eight young men and women were in attendance upon colleges and universities outside of the state. Dr. Sheldon Jackson, recently chiefly known as the apostle of Alaska, was for nearly a score of years active in founding Dullness in Pews.

OUR attention has been called, more especially in religious newspapers, to much excellent advice given to the pulpit. Long series of articles in papers and magazines written by the pew for the benefit of the pulpit. The laity are saying many true things in regard to the arousal of ministers. The demand of the pew is for more animation, more snap, more directness, and more fire. This demand on the part of the pew has had its good effect, and dry bones have got up and shaken themselves. Now, as the pews have been so successful in waking up the pulpit, and as "turn about is fair play" it is time for the pulpits all over the land to wake up the pews. We suspect that much of the former dullness of the pulpits was inherited from the pews. We know not why a religious audience should not look as bright as any other audience; but how often it is that people, who at a concert or lecture looked animated, seem to feel it their duty as soon as they come into a devotional assembly to look stupid. Some hearers shut their eyes and so extinguish as far as the preacher is concerned, the chief light of their face. What is the matter with your eyes? Is it emotion? Oh, no. It is easily seen when that is the reason. You are probably trying to review your accounts at the store, or calculating the prospects for the opening business season. Open your eyes and look the preacher in the face, whatever church you attend. Your manner is a wet blanket on the preacher's enthusiasm. Others listen with an inanimate look. You are a soporific in the house of God. If a speaker begins a sentence with power and happens to see your face about the middle comma, he will, in the last half of the sentence, drop to imbecility. Have you ever seen a preacher in the midst of his sermon get bothered and subside from eloquence into inanity? He saw two or three intelligent men looking as indifferent as dolls. The sun rose clear, but a fog went up from your countenance and beclouded it. It is astonishing how much the manner of listening has to do with the force of the preaching. We will take the contrait of rousing the duller minister that ever addressed an audience, if you will give us twenty alert and wide-awake hearers, placed at proper distances from the pulpit, so that in whatever direction the preacher looks he shall by clash of eyes strike fire. How much spirit would you have in conversation if in your parlor your guests should demean themselves as in church; one of your friends in the armchair closing his eyes, another lying back on the sofa as if he were asleep, another putting his head down on the back of the chair in front of him? You would quit talking and wish they would take their stupidity out of your parlor and go home. But the stolid and unconcerned manner which some men could not endure from their friends, is every Sabbath inflicted on the pastor in many of the churches.

Wake up, or if you are awake, as you probably are, do not let your manner belie your real condition. There are some churches in which the unarousable look is so chronic, so hereditary, so perpetual, that we never want to preach there. If a Methodist should cry out in that assemblage an "Amen," or a "Hallelujah," it would create a panic in the audience and make the reading of the Riot Act appropriate. That church is a pond, frozen over smooth and good for skating but no warm tides of life, no meeting of preacher's earnest eye, with hearers' intent stare. In such churches every Sunday, hum-drum and extract of poppy and ecclesiastical morphine. Come, come church pews, you share with the pulpits in the responsibility of a lethargic service. An eager, intent pew will make a resounding pulpit. We will try to fire up at our end of the column but you must fire up at your end of the column. We will divide the blame and then share in the improvement. We will furnish and shovel in the coal, and you must furnish the kindling wood and open the dampers.

Preaching for the Times.

IN all ages past the best ministers of religion took part in discussion of public affairs. Witherspoon, the great Presbyterian clergyman, made mighty impress upon the American Revolution, and Bishop White's prayers won not only the Divine blessing but secured the approval of our Revolutionary fathers. Rev. Dr. Emmons, in the early history of our country, in Massachusetts, preached about the election of Thomas Jefferson to the Presidency. The Rev. Dr. Mayhem, of Boston, in the early days of our Republic, preached about the repeal of the Stamp Act. But we do not need to go so far back for an example. Every man is before God responsible for his own duty. If the Norwegian boasts of his home of rocks, and the Siberian is pleased with his land of perpetual snow; if the Roman thought that the muddy Tiber was the favored river in the sight of heaven, and if the Laplander shivers out his eulogy of his native clime, and if the Chinese have pity for anybody born outside the Flowery Kingdom, shall not we, born under these fair skies and standing day by day amid these civil and religious liberties, be public spirited? We are sometimes critical of public affairs, but do you know of any land in which you would rather live? Have we sometimes had bad men in official power? So they have in other lands; but we have more opportunity, through the ballot box, to bring them down. There is no land on earth where the taxes are so small as compared with the income. We sometimes stand aghast at the expense of public buildings; but the Peacock Throne of the Great Mogul of Delhi cost one hundred and sixty million pounds sterling. We think we sometimes see great extravagance in our country and time; but Scarus expended for his house and gardens five million eight hundred and fifty-two thousand dollars. Of course the concentration of so much wealth, either on a throne or by a private individual, means for multitudes suffering, squalor, oppression, crime, and death. If, therefore, in lecture or sermon we denounce things on this side of the sea, do not make the mistake of supposing it is any better on the other side. Appreciating the blessings we now have, let us try in every possible way to correct the monopolistic, cis-Atlantic and cis-Pacific, from making things here as bad as they are trans-Atlantic and trans-Pacific.

The Four Great Champions of Justification by Faith.

THEFORE, being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ. Peace with God! This idea is the foundation of all religions, the reason for all sacrifices, penances, and pilgrimages with which consciously sinful men have tried naturally to appease an offended God. But justification by faith is supernatural, and could only come by revelation, and so it did come even in the earliest times; for by faith Enoch, Noah, Abraham, and the Prophets "obtained promises." God counting their faith in his mercy for righteousness.

After the supreme justification on Calvary, the first great preacher of the doctrine was Paul. Peter was a bitter Jew, and would have liked to limit the justification of Christ to a Judaic sect; but Paul's spiritual battle-cry was, "Justification by Faith," and in his Epistles he gave the church the full charter of that liberty with which Christ has made us free. Indeed, Paul's boldness toward Peter regarding the universality of Christ's propitiation, is a grand turning-point in the world's history.

The early fathers, Clement, Barnabas, Polycarp, etc., preserved this great doctrine in its purity; but when Christianity came in contact with the subtle, curious Greek mind, there arose dogmas, and controversies, and useless questioning, and amid them vital faith in Christ was lost. Then from Numidian Africa came a new Paul, called Augustine. He tells us in his "Confessions" that he studied Aristotle, and searched for God in Plato, but in the Epistles of Paul he found all he needed. From their study he arose a second Paul. As the Apostle had gloried in the Cross of Christ and its free grace, so also did Augustine! Paul had been a mighty reasoner, and Augustine's Commentary on Paul's Epistle to the Galatians changed the spirit of the church in his day, and helped to change it again in Luther's. His sermons were plain and popular. "What is it?" he cries out, "that I desire? Why am I your bishop? Why am I in the world? I only to live in Jesus Christ, yet to live in him with you. This is my glory! my joy! my riches!"

The great prominence given by Augustine to the Pauline doctrine of justification by faith had vast results, though vandal persecutions, heresies, and schisms finally severed the Eastern and Western churches. Then in the eighth century the study of Aristotle was revived, and Christianity forced into harmony with it. One of the axioms of this philosophized Gospel, was that whosoever did not believe according to it was an infidel. The vital principle of faith was lost; a thick spiritual darkness gathered, it was too truly the Dark Ages.

But suddenly and simultaneously a strange restlessness agitated humanity on all sides. Old manuscripts were brought out, Greek and Hebrew began to be studied, and the cutting satires of Erasmus, and broad revilings of Rabelais brought this jumble of philosophy and theology into contempt. Men began to search and inquire; the printing-press came; the priestly despots ready for destruction provoked their doom by brutal and senseless cruelties and intolerance, and then came Martin Luther! Like Paul and Augustine, the labarum of Luther was "Justification by Faith!" Like Augustine, Luther was converted by Paul. "St. Paul," he says, "taught me that the Gospel reveals a merciful God who justifies us by faith. Thereupon, I felt as if born again." Then, like Augustine, he also wrote a Commentary on Paul's Epistle to the Galatians—a Commentary that is the foundation stone of Protestantism.

It was for this doctrine of "Justification by Faith," that Luther wrestled with spiritual enemies, braved the wrath of kings, the world's hatred, and the terrors of martyrdom. This faith was in him no mere opinion, it was a living principle producing a high and holy life. His own words explain this result. "We do not say the sun ought to shine; a good tree ought to produce good fruit; seven and three ought to make ten. The sun shines by its own proper light; the good tree in the same manner bears good fruit; and seven and three have made ten from everlasting; so living faith in Christ will produce a Christ-like life." All the great leaders of the Reformation were in points of theology disciples of Paul and Augustine. Calvin's "Institutions," contain hundreds of quotations from St. Augustine.

The Reformation abolished penance and the confessional, and the Protestant must carry the lonely agonies of his wounded conscience to the Cross of Christ. It is sufficient. There is here for him that justification which enables him through the spirit of adoption to cry, "Abba Father!" This was the "glad tidings" that John Wesley brought anew at the close of the last century, and which is still proclaimed over the length and breadth of the world by the preachers after the order of John Wesley—the redemption by Christ's blood—the wrath quenched the ransom paid the sentence of death cancelled the kingdom of heaven opened to all believers in that transcendent propitiation: "Being justified by faith, we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ."

BRIEF NOTES.

A dispatch to the New York Herald reports that Dr. Geo. F. Pentecost has recalled his dedication of the call to Yonkers, N. Y., and has promised to become the pastor of the church.

Major Whittle and Mr. Stebbins have had excellent meetings at Leith, near Edinburgh, and commenced the closing week in an Established Church, with a full house, and with blessing on the Word.

We are glad to learn that the dispatch announcing the serious illness of Dr. Justin D. Fulton was greatly exaggerated. In an open letter he states that his indisposition was very slight, and that he has now completely recovered.

Mr. Isaac Sharp, the veteran missionary of the Society of Friends, now over ninety years of age, has returned from his tour in the Holy Land. In going through London he gave a thrilling narrative of his journey and the scenes he had visited.

The total membership of the Society of Friends is now given throughout the world as 107,948, a net gain of 2,351. In America, the membership is 90,438, and the increase 2,278; while in Europe and Australasia, there are 19,865 members, the increase being 73.

Father Chiniquy is recovering from his severe illness. The veteran champion of Protestantism expects soon to resume his labors. His address, for which several correspondents have asked, is care of Pastor F. H. White, Talbot Tabernacle, London (W), England.

Miss Annie R. Taylor, writing from Vaton, Thibet, reports that the chiefs are now quite willing for her to take up her quarters in the valley. Once there, she believes that only a little more time and with prayer and patience, the way will be opened to Lhasa, the capital of the last stronghold of heathenism.

Dr. Charles Cuthbert Hall, of the First Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, has accepted the nomination for President of Union Theological Seminary to succeed Dr. Hastings, whose ill health years has compelled his resignation. The nomination is regarded as a concession on the part of the seminary to the General Assembly, as Dr. Hall's orthodoxy is well-known.

Booker T. Washington writes us that the next session of the Tuskegee Negro Conference will be held at the Tuskegee Institute, Ala., on Feb. 24. On the following day there will be a conference of representatives of the leading negro schools. He expects that from seven to eight hundred colored farmers and mechanics will attend and give an object lesson of the progress of the colored race.

Revival services are held in various districts of Iowa by Evangelists Hartsough and Hauderschild. At Monticello, where four churches united in the movement there were large accessions to the membership. Many heads of families are included. The aid of the young people's societies has been a marked feature of the work of the Evangelists.

Miss De Broen has over two hundred children in the schools connected with her mission at Belleville, Paris, this year. At a recent reunion, Mr. Paxton, formerly of New York, said that wherever he went in the poorer districts of the French capital, he found the name of Miss De Broen an honored one and the value of her work appreciated.

The King's Daughters and Sons held their Eleventh Annual Convention on January 21-23, in Madison Avenue M. E. Church, New York. Mrs. Isabella Charles Davis said that the Order had now over four hundred thousand members, and was represented in nearly every land on earth. Mrs. Margaret Bottom, the venerable president of the Order delivered an address.

Rev. H. Loomis, the agent of the American Bible Society in Japan, writes to a contemporary: There have been reports of a general defection from the faith among the Japanese Christians. But extensive inquiry has revealed very conclusively the fact that the teaching and acceptance of heterodox views is confined a very limited circle. The great body of Christians is loyal to the truth.

There are in all Japan Buddhist temples to the number of 73,000 and Buddhist priests to the number of 100,000. For every square mile there are an average of three temples and four priests, and for every 540 people there is one temple, and for every 400 people there is one priest. The annual cost of these temples and the people employed in the services is equivalent to twelve million dollars.

Mrs. Isabella Bird Bishop, the famous traveler, is convinced that there is a genuine and earnest movement toward Christianity in Korea. In a recent letter from Seoul to Dr. Ellinwood, she urges the need of more workers in the Pyeng Yang district in western Korea, a region which was the center of the brutal persecutions of native Christians as late as 1864, but is now freely open to Christian missionaries.

Dr. L. W. Munhall closed his meetings at Ottawa on Jan. 19. The interest was maintained until the last. On January 17 the Opera House was crowded long before the hours of meeting, and large numbers were unable to obtain admission. At the meeting for men only over one hundred young men made profession of faith. "It is believed," says the Ottawa Free Press, "that during the meetings not less than twelve hundred persons have been brought to decision for Christ."

A remarkable instance of self-sacrifice is given in the English newspapers. A prisoner in a criminal court, who with a companion was convicted of crime, begged the judge to allow him to bear his companion's sentence in addition to his own. He said there was no excuse for his own share in the crime, but his companion was a hard-working man, who had been tempted by extreme poverty and, as it was his first offence, might reform if he escaped the stigma of convict. He pleaded so earnestly, that the judge released his companion without adding to the pleader's sentence.

We regret to learn that the American Sunday School Union is feeling severely the stringency of the times. A letter from Dr. J. M. Crowell, Secretary of Missions, says that the income of the Union during the past year has been so much smaller than usual that unless the contribution this month are greatly increased, it will be necessary to reduce the number of missionaries for the next fiscal year, which begins March 1. The Union feels the more regret to take this step because these hard-working, faithful men have had during the past year so many tokens of God's blessing on their labors in needy districts.

THE BIBLE

AND THE NEWSPAPER

FIRE MENACES A HOSPITAL.

FIRE, happily untrue, that the great Bellevue Hospital in New York, was on fire, caused a sensation in the city on January 20. The fact that over seven hundred patients are sheltered in the institution, was sufficient to account for the general anxiety the news produced. Every one knew how small a prospect there would be of saving the lives of the large number of sick and helpless people there must be if fire once gained possession of the building. Reassuring news was soon issued. There was a fire there, but it was not the Hospital, but the Medical College, which stands in the Hospital grounds, that was burning. The night-watchman noticed that the windows of the upper story of the College were luminous, and at once realized that the building must be on fire. It is a busy place in the day-time with the Dispensary for out-door patients on the first floor, the offices and physicians' rooms on the second, the amphitheatre where about seven students attend the lectures on the third, and the dissecting-room on the fourth floor. But in the night there is no one in the building. The watchman sent a call to the fire-department and then notified the superintendents of other buildings. Next to the College, and not more than forty feet away is the pavilion for the insane. There was danger of a panic among the demented patients there, but the nurses were on the alert and marched them into the halls where the fire was not so plainly visible as from the dormitories and kept them there until the danger was past. In the main building, all the employees were called up and placed in the different wards ready to remove the patients, should occasion arise. The patients were not informed of the danger and many of them slept through the night without knowing of the fire. The fire-department was promptly on the scene, but the third and fourth floors of the College were burned before the flames could be extinguished. On those floors were the books containing the records of surgical cases which are among the College's most treasured possessions, but happily these were rescued before the fire reached the case in which they were kept. A quantity of surgical instruments, and the furniture, and apparatus were destroyed. There was nothing else on the burned floors but thirteen dead bodies which had been taken there for dissection. They were burned, as there was no opportunity of removing them. The firemen who would cheerfully have risked their lives to save those of the patients, if the fire had spread to the other buildings, had too much sense to incur peril in trying to save a dead body from the flames. Men frequently act as if their bodies were the chief part of their being, pampering them and providing for their pleasures while they neglect their souls; but when they see a body from which the soul has departed they show by their actions that they consider the body is of small account:

For the living know that they shall die, but the dead know not anything, neither have they any more a reward, for the memory of them is forgotten . . . neither have they any more a portion forever in anything that is done under the sun. (Eccles. 9:5,6.)

New Tests for Immigrants.

The conferees of the Senate and the House of Representatives have agreed on the new tests for the restriction of immigrants. If their report is accepted, no immigrant over sixteen years of age will be admitted to the country until his capacity to read and write has been tested and proved. Slips of pasteboard, on which twenty-five words from the Constitution are printed, are to be provided at all our ports. These may be in English or in the language of the country from which the immigrant comes. He will be required to read the slip and to write the words it contains, and afterward to read what he has written. If he fails, he is to be returned at the expense of the steamship company that brought him. The only exception to the rule is of persons over fifty years of age who have relatives here capable of supporting them. Another test is that no immigrant intending to pursue a mechanical occupation or to engage in manual labor for wages shall be admitted unless he honestly and in good faith declares his intention to become a citizen of the United States. There is an exception to this clause in the case of persons who, with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, come to teach new arts or industries. As will be seen, the one test relates to intelligence and education and the other to loyalty. Happily, those who would enter the kingdom of God do not have to pass a test like the former. The ignorant and existed there in the glacial epoch, but until this axe was found, it was believed that the mound-builders were the earliest inhabitants of this country. It is significant that the existence of this race should be proved not by the discovery of fossilized human remains, but by the discovery of an implement. The men themselves have disappeared and left no trace, but an article they made has survived. The men have perished, but their work remains. The Christian must be content to have it so with him—losing his personality and caring nothing for his own honor and glory, but caring much for the permanence of the work.

If any man's work abide . . . he shall receive a reward. (1. Cor. 3: 14.)

Lost with All Hands.

A sad wreck occurred on the Long Island coast on January 21st. An officer of the Quogue life-saving station, Charles Carter by name, patrolling the beach, saw a red light burning off shore. He immediately gave the alarm, and several efforts were made to launch the lifeboat. They all failed. Each time the boat was overturned, and the brave men plunged in the icy waters. Nine figures could be made out on the ship on which the red light was burning. Two men were sitting on the bowsprit and seven were in the foremast rigging. The deck of the vessel was under water. As it was impossible to launch the lifeboat, the mortar was brought young man considered he had been badly treated and he went away in an angry mood. He made no attempt at reconciliation, but quitted the city and went to Pittsburgh, Pa., to live. The girl was distressed when she heard of his departure and her worry increased as the days passed and she heard nothing from her absent lover. Finally she determined to write him and implore his forgiveness. The letter was written, confessing her fault and declaring her sorrow for it, and begging him to return. In closing the letter, the edge of the envelope slightly lacerated her tongue, as she wetted the mucilage on the paper. She thought nothing of it at the time, but a day or two afterwards her tongue began to swell and severe pains racked her body. A physician was summoned who examined her and pronounced her case hopeless. He said that a subtle poison had been absorbed into the blood and had permeated her entire system. The lover received the penitent letter which had done so fatal a work and responded in person; but when he arrived, the girl was dying, and a few hours later she passed away. It was particularly sad that the letter which should have brought joy and reunion should have caused the injury which brought sorrow and separation. A girl who could lay aside her pride sufficiently to write such a letter, one may hope, had appealed to Christ in a similar spirit, confessing her sins and asking pardon. If she did so, we know how heartily Christ would receive her, and how completely he would eradicate from her being the poison of sin which like the poison she took into her system is beyond human remedy.

Behold, I will bring health and cure, and I will cure them. (Jer. 33: 6.)

A Night Among Tarantulas.

An experience which brought a man to the verge of the grave with brain-fever is described by the Globe-Democrat of St. Louis. It appears that a citizen of Parkersburg, W. Va., had occasion to visit Seattle, Wash., recently. At one of the stopping places on the way he had business to transact, and remained over one night. There, his coat was stolen, in the pocket of which was his pocket-book containing all his money and his railroad ticket. While he was considering what he should do, a west-bound train, on which were several fruit cars, came to a stand. The door of one of them stood open, and the unfortunate man, thinking this a good opportunity of reaching his destination, crawled in and lay down. Soon afterwards the door was closed and locked. He fell asleep, but awoke with a start, with the sensation of something with a soft, velvety touch creeping stealthily across his face. The train was going with a terrific speed and the car was dark as pitch. He struck a match and looked around. The car was loaded with bananas. Among them he saw several large tarantulas, their long, hairy bodies looking horribly repulsive in the flickering light of the match. They scurried away as if startled by the light, but as the match went out he fancied he could see them come forth again. He could not get out of the car, the door being locked, and he was almost frenzied with fear. The idea of being shut up for hours, perhaps days, among these dreadful creatures brought a cold perspiration to his forehead. He lay perfectly still, shivering with fright, not knowing any moment when he might be attacked. It seemed hours that he lay so, and he was just dozing when a cold, hairy creature struck his face. He knew no more until he opened his eyes in a hospital at Portland, Ore., and was told that he had been lying there two weeks ill with brain fever. He recovered sufficiently to go home, but the doctors say that his constitution will never forget the shock of the terror he endured during that dreadful night. It does not appear that he was bitten, but the terror of being bitten prostrated him. It shows how potent a power the mind has over the body and how much a man may suffer through pure fear. It is no slight blessing therefore that is promised to the man who puts his trust in God.

Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night; nor for the arrow that flieth by day; nor for the pestilence that walketh in the darkness . . . There shall no evil befall thee. (Ps. 91: 5-10.)

unlearned are welcome; but the latter test all must pass. Christ wants none who will not abjure all other claims for his sake.

So likewise whoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple. (Luke 14: 33.)

A Prehistoric Axe.

A remarkable inference is drawn from the finding of a stone axe near New London, O. Professor Clappole, the geologist of Akron, O., heard recently that a farmer of New London had found an axe while digging a well on his place. He was interested in the discovery and has been to the scene to examine the strange implement. It is of a hard green slate, about four inches long and about two inches thick. Certain marks upon it show that it was certainly carved by a human hand. The strange fact about it is that it was found more than twenty feet below the surface. The strata show, in the opinion of Prof. Clappole, that the man who cut and used the axe belonged to the glacial epoch. Nothing could have formed the strata in the existing order but water flowing from an icy glacier. The deposits were the work of centuries, and there is no possibility as is proved by the structure of the clay and soil, of the axe having dropped through a fissure, or of its having been buried by human hands. It must have been left there by a man who was living before the strata were formed, although hitherto no relics have been found in so low a stratum in this country. Relics found in the Old World showed that man out and a line was shot over the vessel. The crew evidently saw the line, but were too much exhausted to hold it and make it fast. Unable to do any more for their rescue, the life savers waited anxiously for the storm to abate. The vessel seemed to be not more than a mile from shore. She was lying with her broadside toward the beach, all sails were set, and she was pounding heavily. The life savers were eager to go to the rescue, but though the distance was so short, there was no possibility of reaching the imperilled vessel. As they watched anxiously they saw her break in two and sink. The men on board of her disappeared as she rolled over and over, and were seen no more. From the wreckage that drifted ashore it was learned that the vessel was the "Nahum Chapin," of Rockland, Me. It was sad to think that nothing could be done to save the men when they were so near land, but as they could not seize the rope sent them, it was hopeless. It is so with spiritual wrecks. There is the Divine and human side to salvation. The imperilled soul must take hold of the Gospel offer, otherwise it cannot be saved.

The word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it. (Heb. 4: 2.)

A Fatal Letter.

The announcement of the death of a young lady from an apparently trivial cause appears in the Philadelphia Record. It states that a quarrel occurred during the holidays between two lovers. The

THE PRISON OPENED.

Sunday School Lesson for Feb. 14.
Acts 5: 17-32; 5: 1-11. Golden Text,
Acts 5: 29. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

How long a time had elapsed since the assembly of the priests had prohibited Peter and John from preaching in the name of Jesus, is not left on record. But the appeal of these men of God to a higher tribunal, and their continuance in preaching the Word of God with boldness, had brought such a movement that not Jerusalem only, but also all the surrounding cities, poured in their sick and their inquirers to Jerusalem. The very streets were full of them, and mighty works of God in the conversion of souls, and the healing of the sick were of daily, perhaps hourly, occurrence. Jerusalem had

how would she now treat God the Holy Ghost manifested in Christ's disciples? The words which the Lord Jesus had spoken to the apostles were now being fulfilled: "When the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father, he shall bear witness of me, and ye also shall bear witness, because ye have been with me from the beginning." What would Jerusalem do with this witness of God the Holy Ghost? She had not known the time of her visitation, when the Son of God, her Messiah, had come to her, "riding upon an ass, and a colt the foal of an ass," just as the prophet had foretold. (Zech 9: 9); what would she do now that God the Holy Ghost, filling the disciples, was convicting the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment? (John 16: 7, 8.)

Indignation filled the heart of the high priest. Against whom? Who was it that wrought the mighty works which were being done? Not Peter? He himself disclaimed any power which should bring about such results. The high priest was indignant against God, he fought against his Maker, and so did all that were of his party: they rose up, laid hands on the apostles, and put them in the common prison. But God has

A Key to Every Prison;

"the angel of the Lord by night opened the prison doors, and brought them forth, and said, Go stand and speak in the temple to the people all the words of this life." They had only to obey; he who gave the command made himself responsible for the consequences. The same hand which had opened the prison door without awaking the keepers, and had quietly closed those doors behind them, held each of their souls in life just so long as he needed their testimony. Obedient to his command they went into the temple early in the morning and taught.

While they were giving forth, and the people were drinking in, the precious truths of the Word of God, the high priest was laying his plans to quench the Spirit of God by finally stopping the mouths of his witness. Now it was not only the priests but the secular power, "the senate of the children of Israel," which was convoked; and the priests thought their scheme was so well laid that it was certain of success. But these men left out of their reckoning him whose priests they nominally were, and found to their dismay that the most important parties to the trial, the prisoners themselves, were not forthcoming. What had happened? The prison was there, the locks had not been tampered with, the guard stood without and could give no account of it, but the prison was empty!

Child of God, in any or circumstances should so hedge thee round that thou art deprived of all liberty of movement, fast shut up in prison, do not fear, only be still and trust thy God. Do not seek to free thyself; let God work; stand still and see his salvation.

At last the august assembly began to be disconcerted; foiled at all points, they inquired one of another, not of God, "where unto this would grow." O, that it had grown to a victory over them! O, that they had let themselves be convicted, humbled, broken, ashamed before the undoubted power of God! In the midst of their confusion a messenger arrives with the startling tidings: "Behold the men whom ye put in prison are standing in the temple and teaching the people." And it was not the disciples now who feared either the priests or the officers who were sent to apprehend them.

The lives of the officers were far more in danger than theirs were; and lest they themselves should be stoned, the officers brought them without violence.

The high priest himself conducted the trial, and as soon as the prisoners stood before him he asked: "Did we not strictly command you that ye should not teach in this name? and behold ye have filled Jerusalem with your doctrine, and intend to bring this man's blood upon us." "We ought to obey was the God-given, unflinching reply: "The God of our fathers raised up Jesus, whom ye slew and hanged on a tree. Him hath God exalted with his right hand to be a prince and a saviour, for to give repentance to Israel and forgiveness of sins. And we are witnesses of these things, and so also is the Holy Ghost, whom God hath given to them that obey him." Not one shadow of excuse, not a shade of an apology, no justification of themselves, no breath of fear. In the light of the Holy Spirit who dwelt in them, these men saw Jesus in his princely power, and they walked and stood and spoke before him, heeding no other and in obedience to his known will; they would not apologize for obedience to him whom the very judges were also bound to obey. But the word which convicted did not convert those who were grieving the Spirit. One of two things lay before them: Either they must yield and take the place of lost, undone sinners, needing such a saviour as Jesus, or they must maintain their enmity against God. Their fatal decision was the latter; self-interest demanded that they should silence those men of God; they took counsel to slay them!

There was one exception. Even in this council, one honest heart was to be found. It was Gamaliel, at whose feet Paul the apostle had sat; whose instructions had laid the foundation for the moral integrity which he had, even in his unconverted days. Gamaliel was a "doctor of law, and had in reputation among all the people." He also had been "cut to the heart," but the effect of the wound was other in his case than it had been in the case of the remainder of the council. With them the first thought was, what is to our interest; how does the matter touch us? With him it was the exact contrary.

How Does it Touch God?

After sending the apostles away from the council for a short time, he put before his fellow councillors the solemn risk they ran of fighting against God. "Ye men of Israel," he said, take heed to yourselves what ye intend to do as touching these men; and after quoting two examples of revolutionary leaders who had come to naught, he continued, "And now I say unto you refrain from these men, and let them alone; for if this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to naught; but if it be of God ye cannot overthrow it; lest haply ye be found to fight against God." Who would have thought that in such a way deliverance would come? The disciples seemed to be in the most imminent danger, but the same mighty hand which had opened their prison turned the hearts of their deadly enemies. To him they agreed. The apostles were called, beaten, again commanded not to speak in the name of Jesus, and set at liberty.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

An interesting glimpse of society in Jerusalem is afforded in the verses intervening between last week's lesson and that of this week. The teaching of the Apostles broke society up into groups, as earnest, practical teaching commonly does. There were the common people, who heard them gladly and, as it still is in all lands, were the first to accept the Gospel. There were the people who had sick relatives and friends who probably cared little about the Gospel, but very much about getting healing for their loved ones, and who tried all kinds of superstitious devices for getting it, some even hoping that Peter's shadow falling on them would be efficacious. There were people inclined to favor the new ideas but afraid to declare themselves. A man had need be very much in earnest to join the Church in those days. He was liable to be imprisoned if he took a prominent part and if he tried to deceive he might meet the fate of Ananias. No wonder that there were many who "durst not join themselves to the Apostles." Then there were the priests and the chief men of the nation, the high council of State, who were disturbed by the innovation. They were conservative and, as they were in good positions, in honor and in comfort, they wished for nothing so much as for things to remain as they were. The existing conditions satisfied them. They were a queer combination. It seems almost inconceivable to read of the high priest's chosen friends being infidels. In fact, as we learn from Josephus, the high priest who succeeded Caiaphas and Annas was himself a Sadducee, a man who did not believe in a resurrection or another life. If we imagine a bishop being an infidel, or associating altogether with infidels, we might get a conception of the attitude of these high priests. They were in a position where a delicate balance was essential, and where the rude winds of logic, and impassioned oratory of men who believed strongly, would cause trouble. There seemed to be a general feeling in the upper circles of society that the noisy agitators who were attracting crowds and performing wonderful cures should be suppressed. Accordingly they were arrested and imprisoned. It was not altogether the best way of silencing them, but it was simple and apparently effective. The Apostles were guilty of contempt of court and there was no question of their having disobeyed. So the Sanhedrim and the lay members, here called the senate, were convened to hear and pass sentence. But on sending for the prisoners, it is found that they are not in prison, but are in the Temple preaching again. This was evidently no escape. A prisoner who has broken jail is careful to avoid publicity. Luke tells the story of the deliverance in detail and declares it supernatural. An angel from the Lord did it, he says. God does interfere to protect his people sometimes. At other times he allows them to remain, that they may show that they are ready to suffer for his sake. If the Christian were always delivered, there would be nothing heroic in serving Christ. But the manner of their deliverance seems to have made an impression on the court, whether it was admitted or not. They are not dealt with as we should expect prisoners who had broken jail would have been treated. They are simply reminded of the previous prohibition and there is a querulous note of complaint in the address, as of persons who have been injured, but are powerless to resent it. The court is hurt, is grieved, and has lost its dignity. Peter's answer, like his former one, is brief, logical, and accusatory. Doubtless the judges themselves had at some time made similar answer to the Romans. There was a law higher than human law, and this Peter claims to have obeyed. And as to the complaint that the Apostles sought to make them responsible for Christ's death the facts were clear enough. It was God who was against the court. He had taken Jesus whom they hanged—Peter boldly reiterates the charge on their being the guilty parties—and has exalted him. The Apostles are merely his witnesses. The consultation which followed must have been a serious one. It ended illogically in their renewal of the prohibition against preaching and the prisoners being beaten to impress it on their memories and then discharging them. So far from this treatment having the desired effect, the Apostles rejoiced in the punishment as an honor, and immediately proceeded to disobey again. So much changed are they since when their Master was arrested they forsook him and fled.

Where unto this would grow. The world's rulers have often been perplexed in dealing with Christian men who are in earnest. It seemed that a poor, obscure monk like Luther would easily be crushed when the mighty Emperor Charles and the Pope were of one mind about it. D'Aubigne relates a story of some player setting this before the Emperor in an impressive way. A man threw on the floor a bundle of crooked sticks, and as he retired the Emperor read the name of Erasmus on his back. Several persons tried to straighten the sticks and failed. Then the monk came in and looked at them, and put a light to them. On his back was the name of Luther. The next to enter was an ecclesiastic, who ran to the other end of the room where stood two pitchers, one of which was labelled "oil" and the other "water," and in his agitation seized the one containing oil and emptied it on the fire, only increasing the blaze. On his back was the name of the Pope. The next to enter was a man dressed in royal robes, who drew his sword and drove it through the fire again and again, but could not in that way extinguish it. There was no need to indicate the potentate he was intended to represent. And the fire burned on until a was consumed. Charles found the fire Luther kindled to be of that kind. A Europe was enlightened by it, and neither king nor pope could extinguish it.

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE.

BRITISH FISHER VILLAGES.

The Peculiar Folk Who "Follow the Sea"—Women as Fishmongers—The Scottish "Fisher-Lasses."

Tis seldom that the tourist who is explaining the sights and visiting the famous localities in the British Islands, encounters the simple class who are known as the "fisher-folk." Occasionally an artist, in search of new types for his canvas, may happen among them, but the average traveler is very likely to miss them altogether. All along the Scottish and English coasts are fishing villages, whose occupants constitute a class widely different in many respects from the rest of the population. Built away down in some wide cove among the cliffs, or on the margin of some little rock-bound bay, sheltered on three sides and open only to the sea, many of these villages are strange, self-contained, tiny communities. There are probably a score or two of stoutly built stone cottages with thatched roofs, a row of smoke-houses, a fleet of single-masted fishing-boats tied up in the little harbor, a white chapel, and back beyond the cliff somewhere, on lower ground, a tidily kept graveyard. Sometimes the exigencies of their calling have driven the fisher-folk to settle in some good-sized sea-coast town. They select quarters as near the sea as possible, and their rows of white single-story and attic cottages are huddled together in the form of a square, with an open lot at each corner. Our photographs on this page afford a glimpse of a Scottish fishing village and its inhabitants. The men who are up before dawn to mend their nets and see to the boats, wait the right change in the tide before setting out for the day's venture. Sometimes the fleet, supposing its fishing-ground to be nearby—sets sail in the afternoon and stays out all night. This is frequently the case in the mackerel season. When dawn tinges the eastern sea, the nets are drawn and the catches taken in, and the fleet points for the pier, and when the boats are emptied of their miscellaneous catch, a busy scene ensues. Everybody without exception is busy counting and assorting the fish, and in an incredibly short time the entire catch is off to market, where it is disposed of to wholesale dealers, sold on stalls, or hawked through the streets in wheelbarrows trundled either by men or women, or in "creels" (woven wicker baskets) strapped on the women's shoulders.

Trudging along with the "creels" filled to the top with herring, "whiting," mackerel, or cod-fish, the "fisher-lasses" call out their wares as they pass through the poorer sections of the town or city. They find their market almost wholly among the poor: the rich patronize the stalls. The voices of the fisher-folk are pitched in a peculiar nasal key, and they speak with a broad accent and in a "sing-song" tone, which one hears nowhere else. Hardy and resolute, the fishermen are true "sons of the sea," and spend the greater part of their lives upon it. Their homes are neat, clean, and comfortable, but they are more at ease on their snug, close-calked, broad-beamed boats than on shore. Every season adds to the record of lives lost in the fisheries; sometimes an entire fleet of scores of boats is devoured by the angry sea. But such calamities do not deter them from again venturing forth, each man trusting to a Higher Power for deliverance from danger and believing that death is sure. To those that stay and those that roam, But they never more endure To sit with empty hands at home.

Another Champion of Stepmothers.

There seems to be no lack of interest in the stepmother question. Miss S. M., La Grange, Ind., writes: "I had a stepmother and lived with her for over thirty years; and she was just as good to me as my own mother would have been had she lived to raise me. Everybody said I had the best stepmother they had ever seen. There are exceptions to every rule, and there are stepmothers and stepmothers. Sometimes the fault is theirs; sometimes the children are to blame, when there is trouble between them; but no one can say I was not good to mine, for I thought much of her, and always tried to please her."

The Energy of Youth.

In a recent address, President Canfield of Ohio State University, speaking of the opportunities of young men, said: "We know no kings in America, except that American sovereign who puts a man under his hat every time he leaves his own house. We know no elite of the human race in the sense of knowing some special governing class, or some class which is by reason of birth to be given precedence and right of way on the track. Our 'registered stock' is scattered all through our society, and is found in every stratum. Pedigree counts as it ought to count, when it gives men clearer brains and cleaner hands and swifter feet in the service of their fellow-men; but it counts for very little because it happens to appear in some human 'herd book,' and for even less because it chances to be found on the muster roll of state or national officials. The world will not ask from whose loins have you sprung, but what are you, and what can you do?"

A Little Act of Kindness.

Little kindnesses are gems set in the diadem of character. A pretty story is being told about Mrs. Cleveland that shows her kindness of heart. At one of her big receptions, when hundreds of people seek the White House and look for at least a moment's personal recognition, there was once to be seen an old colored woman, a veritable mammy, leading by the hand a small boy. The child wore patched clothing, and looked as if he did not always have enough to eat. As they approached Mrs. Cleveland he looked anxiously about, and when he saw the way in which people were "hustled" along he seemed rather crestfallen. The president's wife, however, catching sight of him, made a step forward, took his hand and actually detained the line while she said a few kindly words. As they passed, after the lad had been cheered by a sweet smile, he exclaimed, sotto voce, "She did see me, after all, gran'ma."

A Russian Village Wedding.

Curiosity is not considered a reprehensible trait among Russian peasant women, says a writer in Travel, and especially if the occasion of its exercise be a wedding. We attended such a wedding and there hundreds of women, many of them standing on the pew seats, craning their necks, were behaving in an indecorous manner to catch glimpses of the bride. That is a habit not limited to Russian ladies, even where there are no pew seats to clamber over. They made up for the loss by the squeezing, and pushing, and treading on one another's heels. The young lady—in her moire silk, tulle veil and orange blossoms—was taken into church by her heavily epauletted officer-brother. In the centre of the building was a little desk, where a silver cross lay and a massive candle flared. The music was sung by a full-lunged choir, and a priest handed two tinselled candles to the presumably happy but certainly nervous couple. These were held in the left hand during the service. After much singing, an intoning, and chanting, the elder of the priests

A GOLDEN WEDDING.*
DEAREST one, we both remember Fifty years ago to-day,
How the sky was bright with splendor
As we wove our marriage lay.
Fifty years of holy union
Call for gratitude divine;
Fifty years of sweet communion
Now awaken joys sublime!
Thou didst help me kindly, dearest,
When earth's sorrows bowed me low;
Strengthened often, when severest
Trials had their darkest flow.
When my life seemed only losses,
When my heart bled at each pore,
Thou didst help me bear my crosses
And each day thou helped me more.
So our joys have been the brighter,
So our bitterer more sweet,
So our cares have been the lighter,
As our love grew more complete.
Lighter! There were two to bear them,
In their passing to and fro;
Sweeter! There were two to share them,
Since the "Fifty years ago."
Praises then for years of gladness,
More than those our spirits bowed;
More of cheerfulness than sadness,
More of sunshine than of cloud.
Less of autumn, more of vernal,
More of health and less of pain;
Blessed hopes of Life Eternal,
Every loss a greater gain.

Kitchen Slavery.

WHILE in the regular harness of city life the sitting-room is so far from the kitchen that we have not much understanding of its toils and perplexities, writes Dr. Talmage, we have not much to say save when there has been an accident, and the pudding comes in burned or the coffee has not been settled. But in the country we have more time to consider. First: there is the grace of managing a balky stove. You may begin to rattle over the names of stoves which never flinch, which do things brown at the right moment, which never take up the habits of our human race and begin to smoke, and never let the fire go out. But we do not believe you. Stoves belong to a fallen race, and the best of them sometimes prove tricky. The best dispositioned stoves will sometimes refuse to broil, or stew, or bake, or frizzle. You reason with it and tell it how important it is that it do its duty, for company has come, or a departing guest must meet the train, or you are too tired to bother any longer, and all it does in reply is to sputter. Here is a place for Christian sympathy and help. For lack of this Martha of Bethany acted precipitately, and many a good woman has lost her equilibrium. Then there is a grace needed for the pantry. Somehow cups and glasses and cake-baskets will get broken, and no one has done it. Knives will disappear, and no one has taken them. An old saucer that was given to your grand-mother the day of her marriage is cracked and set back on the shelf as though it had been uninjured. The tea-caddy has been despoiled. There are but few women who can keep their temper when their best china set gets broken. To study economy for a month, and to find the result has leaked out at some mysterious spigot; to have the wash-boiler boil over and put out the fire; to have the dessert only half done when the people at dinner are waiting, wondering whether it is to be sago pudding or Narcissus blanc-mange; to have the servant leave the house in the midst of the ironing; to have to provide elaborate entertainment for some one whom you asked to come to your house without any idea she would accept the invitation; to find after the quinces are peeled and cut that the brass kettle is borrowed,—all this demands grace for the kitchen.

produced two gold rings on a little silver tray, and waving each three times in the sign of the cross, put them on the third fingers of the right hands. Two golden crowns were brought from the altar, and for a full half hour they were balanced over the heads of the groom and bride by spruce officers. Led by the priests, the couple perambulated the church thrice, while crown-bearing friends hopped along, performing not very successfully the task of holding the crowns over the heads and keeping their feet from the bride's luxuriant train. There was next the administering of the sacrament, three sips, and the kissing of the silver cross three times, much blessing, much majestic roaring of choral voices, and then a wild scramble of all the ladies to see the pair drive off.

THE KING'S HIGHWAY

A STORY OF THE BROADER CHRIST-LIFE

MEN PROPOSE; WOMEN DECIDE.

BY

AMELIA E. BARR.

He is an American girl," Alice continued, "is distinction enough. What worth is there in a title?"

"No worth at all," said Jessie, "but titles are like the feathers in a cock's tail, or the ruffles round a girl's neck; they are ornamental and please the majority. All the way here this morning I have been dreaming so pleasantly of your marriage. I wish you were going to be Lady Medway."

"Why should you wish that?" "Oh! I may as well confess that my reasons were thoroughly selfish ones. I expected pleasure and ecclat from the event. I hoped in some humble fashion to take part in it and I thought, perhaps, if I managed a trip to England in a year or two, you would invite me to visit you. There! there! I have told the truth, and the whole truth, for once. Not many girls would have been as honest. Let us go to our music lesson now."

"Just a moment—I think you are in love with that handsome fellow you call Steve Morrison?"

"Suppose I am; what then?" "Would you give him up for Lord Medway, or any other lord? Would you? Tell me the truth, and the whole truth, once more."

Jessie dropped her eyes and held her chin reflectively. She evidently desired to return a truthful answer, and Alice waited patiently for it. In a few minutes it was ready. The eyes of the girls met, a smile rippled over Jessie's face and she said with a frank decisiveness:

"No; I would not."

Then Alice laughed joyously as she answered, "I thought you were better than your words. Now, if you like, we will go to the piano."

Alice was quite right in attributing the public avowal of her marriage to her father. Nicholas Lloyd was a wise man where money was in question; he was a foolish man where women were concerned. He had one fixed standard for them, not understanding that one standard will not at all times measure even one woman! There are so many women in one woman! He had left his wife and daughter on the previous day in a mood of great irritation, but their opposition affected him in no other way. Extremely sensitive to public opinion himself, he found it impossible to believe in the indifference of Alice to a power he so cringingly respected. The idea of announcing her forthcoming marriage struck him in the cars, and he considered it a remarkably clever one. Indeed, many wondered that morning at the serene smile of satisfaction on his countenance; and some of the knowing ones predicted the condition of certain stocks from it.

As soon as he reached the city he sent to the family photographer and procured some late portraits of his daughter. He put them in a conspicuous position on his private desk. He expected Lord Medway to call, and about noon that gentleman arrived. He read over the draft of the papers relative to his marriage and to Alice's fortune; and expressed his perfect satisfaction, adding cheerfully:

"There is nothing, now, Mr. Lloyd, to prevent me wooing my bride, and fixing the date of the ceremony as early as I can persuade her to make me happy."

"Nothing but Miss Lloyd's consent," answered the father with a touch of sarcasm for his pride in both his money and his daughter was offended by the young man's air of easy acceptance. "Miss Lloyd astonished and annoyed me very much yesterday by asserting her right to choose her own husband, and her disinclination to accept you in that capacity."

"But why does she now object to me?"

"Girls are queer," he answered musingly. "Her pride is roused. She talks about marrying for love, and for love only. I thought Alice was a thoroughly up-to-date girl, and then as soon as marriage is named she is as full of sentiment and romance, as women have always been. I don't know what to make of it, nor yet what is to be done."

Medway looked much troubled. He was not a mercenary young man, in the worst sense of the word, but he had thought of Mr. Lloyd's millions, and of Mr. Lloyd's daughter, until they had become part and parcel of his life and estate. Also he had talked of his good fortune to both his friends and his creditors, and he could not bear to think of the scornful doubts which would surely follow his disappointment.

Lloyd perceived his perplexity and divined its cause, and he so played upon the young noble's chagrin and fears that he was willing to do anything to consummate so desirable a marriage. Then Lloyd lifted his daughter's picture, looked at it with thoughtful speculation, and asked Medway if he had any of himself. "You see," he continued, "if your pictures were published together, and the marriage formally will, in the meantime, give instructions to reporters, and to-morrow morning Miss Lloyd will find herself absolutely committed to a marriage that she will be proud enough of, as soon as she understands it is inevitable. Why it will bring her everything a woman desires, even that perpetual sympathy which is the sweetest of feminine morsels. She will cry a little to all her friends as she shows her fineries, and say 'she is being forced into matrimony,' and they will condole with her, and envy her, at the same time. That is a kind of bitter-sweet that women enjoy so much, that they easily reconcile themselves to its occasion."

"It is not a very honorable transaction." "It is perfectly honorable. You cannot do with women as with men. They don't understand a straightforward manner, for they are a crooked sex. After your marriage you can tell Alice all about it, and she will smile at our clever diplomacy. Anyway and all ways are fair in love."

And Nicholas Lloyd really thought so. His moral character, by constant wear and tear in the money market, had become thin, tentative, and provisional. It spoke, or it was silent at his pleasure. But yet he did not like the thought of meeting Alice, and he concluded to take his new secretary home with him. His presence would be a restraint, and the first explanation be softened by the social necessity of control in the company of strangers.

Alice thought this meeting with her father to be extremely important, and she came into the dining-room with the offend-

"Oh, rubbish! Don't be foolish, Alice. You can't help it. Nobody blames you. I have seen Medway, and he is quite pleased at the compliment."

"Oh! Perhaps it was his doing. I will never speak to him again. I will not permit myself to be compromised into marriage. People may say what they like, won't! I won't!"

"Mr. McAslin, give your arm to Mr. Lloyd. We will have dinner before controversy." Mrs. Lloyd entered as he spoke and he immediately joined her and proceeded to the dining room. "We can discuss the matter later in the evening, Alice," he said, turning his head to make the remark, which he did with an unusual gracious indifference, as if it was a subject of little moment.

Alice then accepted the requirements of the hour for further discussion at the time, would have involved the taking of the servants into the family confidence. So she allowed a smile to brighten her face, and became suddenly lovely, for the sole reason that she suddenly knew herself beloved. How did she know it? He does the flower know when the sun shines. John did not say a word; he did not even dare to glance into her face, but she knew he loved her. There was a silent, secret understanding between his soul and soul. Perhaps their angels had confided and had agreed upon the marriage. Perhaps Love had always stood waiting the door of their hearts, and the very moment a glance set it on the latch he entered. Yet, though both were conscious of their guest, neither had yet dared say, "Welcome, beloved! Come in, dwell with me."

It was to Mr. Lloyd's interest to keep the conversation as far as possible from society affairs—from newspapers, from marriage, and the like; but so few subjects, except money and the relation of money, ever entered his mind that he could think of nothing to say. There was a silence, in which every one was extremely self-conscious and uncomfortable; in Mrs. Lloyd broke the embarrassing silence by an inquiry about Max Lehman; and Mr. Lloyd took an immediate advantage of the question. Any subject far removed from Lord Medway was welcome; even socialism.

"Lehman," he said, "is a passionate, violent man, is he not, Mr. McAslin?"

"He is of the people, and for the people, sir; but he is at least sincere."

"Perhaps, but sincerity is not the error of the worst kind is often sincere. He has a bold voice, and a few phrases, and these things go a long way with such audiences as Lehman has. In fact, they go all the way."

"I cannot say that," answered Mrs. Lloyd. "The people whom he addresses are mostly poor and distressed, and like sufferers they are looking for a remedy."

"There is no suffering and no want in New York. It is not cared for in the city of New York. Look at our hospitals, schools, libraries, charities of all kinds and descriptions!"

"But, Mr. Lloyd," said John, "these things convict our social condition of sins; they are the medicine of disease, not the bread of life. The mere giving of money is not sufficient if we are morally blind; we must do as Lehman does, get into the feelings and sufferings of our people. Then our emotions will enlighten our understandings, and we shall try to prevent rather than to cure."

Mrs. Lloyd looked at John with a so eager, so full of question and desire, even her husband was astonished by this unusual expression. "To prevent! she cried, "Oh, if we only could! But how is it to be done?"

"There are so many ways possible to the rich."

"That is so easily said. If you could be more specific!"

"I can. I think a rich man should himself some one great and possible of the city, and give to the poor those which it was possible for them to live cleanly and virtuously. He could find a University in which there should be absolutely free tuition, and no one could compute how much this one good deed would change the world in a single generation. He could keep the House of Legislature pure."

"Oh! Oh! Come now Mr. McAslin, you are magnifying the power of gold in the wrong direction."

announced, it would be next to an impossible thing, for Alice to decline it. She could hardly bear to go into society again if it was broken off."

"To force the young lady into marriage by such means would be a cruelty," Medway answered. "I could not do it. There must be some other way"—yet even while he was making this disclaimer, he was considering that a public announcement of this kind would exonerate him from any suspicion of trying to deceive or of trading on a lie, even if the affair did finally fall through.

Mr. Lloyd smiled at his scruple. He did not understand a man, who was not ready and willing to accomplish his ends and serve himself, by any sure means within his power. "Alice's hesitations," he affirmed, "were simply a girl's romantic fancies." He was certain that the man who dared boldly to put them out of consideration would, in the end, win her love and gratitude for his courage and wisdom. "Besides," he added, "if you think it best, lay the whole blame on me. If it be a fault to make a daughter accept a great fortune, then I will take the blame. It is mine, and I am proud to take it. Allow me to manage this affair. I know Alice Lloyd better than you do. I know the sex also. Nothing pleases a woman more than to be forced into doing the thing she has already determined in her own heart to do."

"Shall I go and see her to-day?"

"To-morrow will be better. Send me down immediately some of your photos. I ing paper in her hand. Her eyes bore the traces of her weeping, her face was white and troubled, and yet there was an air of pride and anger in her address that seemed likely to assert itself above all conventionalities. She saw John at her entrance, and a flash of feeling, clear and swift as light, passed between them. His presence, however, did not deter her from the inquiry she intended. She touched her father lightly on the arm, and he looked up from a letter he was reading, and said with an affectation of pleasant surprise: "Ah! then, it is you at last. Now we can have dinner. Is your mother coming down stairs?"

"Mother is coming, and dinner is ready; but father, first of all, you must look at this," and she put the paper into his hand.

"So you have seen the report?" he said. "Well, what about it?"

"What about it? Everything wrong and shameful about it. I expect you to punish the makers of such lies."

"Lies? Nonsense! It is, perhaps, a little premature. McAslin, how do these reporting fellows catch on to things?"

"Generally some one tells them, sir."

"And my picture, too, father, how did they get it?"

"From the photographer, I suppose. Come my dear, I am hungry, and I don't want my dinner spoiled by silly complaining. Most girls would like to be so —"

"Placarded! No, indeed, they would not. It has nearly broken my heart. I am so mortified—so indignant—"

DENOMINATIONAL WORK.
Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week beginning Feb. 14. "A Bird's-Eye View of Christian Activities." Zech. 4:1-14.

WHEN the sense of comradeship supersedes the feeling of rivalry the first step will be taken toward the ideal which Christ cherished and for which he prayed: that his people might be one. Peoples, constituted as we are, with varied dispositions, with hereditary affiliations, and with the influence of education and early training, the nearest approach to Christ's ideal that we can hope for in the near future is this friendly recognition of brotherhood. Party names and party organizations will remain, with all their disadvantages and impediments. Some doctrine, or rite, or mode of worship, or peculiar ceremony, or system of Church government suffices to set a wall around the party of Christ's followers, excluding them from communion and fellowship with other Christians. As an eloquent preacher observed recently, these dividing walls will not be removed while we continue to have decided principles and opinions, but they may be lowered so that the man within one closure can reach over the wall and shake hands with his brother in another closure. While then, the subject for consideration this week tends to special denominational interest, it should not lead to invidious comparisons. We may rejoice, and we may have reason to rejoice, in what our own denomination is doing for the advance of Christ's kingdom in the world, but the record should not be made the basis of disparagement of other denominations. Our movements ought not to be measured relatively. The fact of our having a hundred missionaries in the foreign field should be considered in relation to the number we might be supporting, not in relation to some other denomination which has but one hundred missionaries in the field. The work being done by any one denomination must be measured by the capacity of that denomination and at the last it will be so measured. When the Lord of the harvest reckons with his laborers, the fact that some have done more than others will not be taken into account, but the reward will be apportioned according to whether the laborers have done all that is in their power to do.

The "bird's-eye view," recommended by the Committee, should not be limited to a special sphere of labor. The foreign field is naturally a most attractive here, and will receive the greater share of attention, but important as it is, it does not comprise the whole of the church's duties. Christ's followers have their duties at home which must not be neglected. It will be well to ask what our denomination is doing toward the solution of the problems near at hand. Christ's command to preach the Gospel to all nations must not be neglected, and we are glad to see how much Christian endeavor is doing to stimulate and encourage the efforts of the churches in this work; but there are other matters demanding attention which we cannot afford to overlook. It is notorious that the missionary church which gives liberality to Foreign Missions is a church which will give liberally and work heartily in other fields if the needs of those fields are brought to its notice. It is important, therefore, in this survey that these fields should be considered. We live, in the problem of the colored race and the Indians, a question of great urgency for the church of Christ. What our denomination doing to prove to the world that the followers of Christ have, at last, realized their duty, and are resolved to atone for the negligence of the past? There are in all our great cities representatives of almost every nation on earth. What is our denomination doing to teach them that in Christ is the life which can take them true men? Then there is the problem of poverty. Is our denomination doing anything to solve this problem? Is the church's business because the poor have a special legacy left to us by our Lord? Then, therefore, we consider what our denomination is doing, it will be well to take these matters into account.

• CHEERFUL SERVICE.
"SERVE God and be cheerful." The darkness
Only masks the surprises of dawn;
And the deeper and grimmer the midnight.
The brighter and sweeter the morn.
"Serve God and be cheerful." The winter
Rolls round to the beautiful spring,
And o'er the green grave of the snowdrift
The nest-building robins will sing.
"Serve God and be cheerful." Look upward!
God's countenance scatters the gloom;
And the soft summer light of his heaven
Shines over the cross and the tomb.
"Serve God and be cheerful." Each sorrow
Is— with your will in God's—for the best.
O'er the cloud hangs the rainbow. To-morrow
Will see the blue sky in the west.
"Serve God and be cheerful." Live nobly
Do nobly and right. Make the best
Of the gifts and the work put before you
And to God without fear leave the rest.
And live out the glad tidings of Jesus—
In the sunshine he came to impart,
For the fruit of his Word and his Spirit
"Is love, joy, and peace" in the heart.

TURNING TO GOD.
Is there a lone and dreary hour,
When worldly pleasures lose their power?
My Father! let me turn to thee,
And set each thought of darkness free.
Is there a time of racking grief?
Which scorns the prospect of relief?
My Father! break the cheerless gloom,
And bid my heart its calm resume.
Is there an hour of peace and joy,
When hope is all my soul's employ?
My Father! still my hopes will roam,
Until they rest with thee, their home.
The noontide blaze, the midnight scene,
The dawn, or twilight's sweet serene,
The glow of life, the dying hour,
Shall own my Father's grace and power.
And while such lofty memories roll
In solemn grandeur o'er my soul,
May Christ be with me, he who came
To teach our Father's tender name.

THE LORD'S BRIDE.
Distinctions Which will be Made at the Lord's Coming Between the Classes of Christians.
BY MRS. M. BAXTER.

THE Bride of the Lamb first appears in the Word of God. Rev. 19. There we have these glorious words: "And I heard as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings, saying, Alieluia: for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth. Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honor to him: for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready." In Rev. xxi. 2, we read: "And I, John, saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband." And these words are but the "preface" of the whole of this wonderful chapter which speaks of the Lord's coming for his Bride.

Here we see the distinction between the coming of Christ for his servants and the coming for his Bride. In Matt. xxv., the Bride is not seen, but the virgins, her companions. The virgins are never spoken of as the Bride; the Bridegroom does not give them his name. They expect the Bridegroom and the marriage feast, the Lord's joy is theirs, but the Bride is not formed until the members of Christ's body who compose the Bride are gathered at his coming. The virgins took their lamps, and went forth to meet the Bridegroom: their light was their striking characteristic. Those who understand, and are looking for Jesus as a Bridegroom, work for him, perhaps, as much as the servants do, but it is their life more than their work which is striking to an outsider: the spirit in which they speak and act rather than the things said or done: it is the presence of another with them, rather than anything in themselves, which is recognized.

"At midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the Bridegroom cometh: go ye out to meet him." Such a cry would not be needed by the Bride. All the virgins had to do was to trim their lamps; the oil was there, and the wick was there, and the light was soon kindled. Just as the coming of the Lord Jesus separates between the true and the false in the servant vocation, so is it also in the vocation of the virgins. The foolish said unto the wise: "Give us of your oil; for our lamps are gone out." Poor, foolish virgins! they had all the outside devotedness, all the doctrine, all the devout sayings which the wise had, but the Holy Spirit's indwelling they had not, and they had to find, when it was too late, that the Holy Ghost cannot be given second hand. They must go to them that sell and buy for themselves. There are those who have never exchanged their spirit for the Spirit of God: they have not paid the price. Just in a rush at last they go to buy, and it is too late! They that are ready go in with him to the marriage, and the door is shut.

Here there is no record of a reckoning made: the Bridegroom shares with his Bride all that he has, and "the virgins, her companions," seek no reward: to minister to him is recompense enough. Their betrothal takes place down here. In the midst of the frets and the worries of daily life, we can take our Lord for better for worse; here we can learn the suffering with him which brings about the truest unity.

The question arises in some hearts: "Do not you make an unwarrantable distinction between the Bride and the servants? We make no system; we know not how the Lord may lead on his servant-children and show them their short-coming of the high vacation. The Bride, remember, is not awakened by the midnight cry, it is to rouse the virgins: the Bride is not called to the marriage supper of the Lamb: how could she be? She is one of the inviting parties, it is her marriage as well as his.

HEROIC PERSONALITIES

By REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

The Heroine of Alaska.

FIFTEEN years ago, last November, I was on board a train on what was then the only railroad in Western Washington, making the journey from Portland, Oregon, to the new and straggling village which has since grown into the ambitious young city of Tacoma. It was a slow train, for the road-bed was new, but the tedious hours lost their weariness to me after making the acquaintance of one of my fellow-passengers, who was on her way back to Alaska to take up her mission work among the Indians.

My new acquaintance was Mrs. A. R. McFarland, who had gone to Alaska four years earlier, and with heroic devotion had devoted herself to the saving of the young girls in that far-off land. For more than a year this lady, delicately reared and cultured, fitted to enjoy the refinements of society, was the only white woman in Alaska Territory, because she believed it to be her duty, and esteemed it her privilege to teach her ignorant heathen sisters of the North the truths of that Gospel which has lifted the burden from woman's shoulders in every land where it has been carried. I have not forgotten yet the thrill of admiration and reverence that went through my heart as I listened to her story as the train jolted on through the Puget Sound forest. I felt myself to be in the presence of one of the world's purest and bravest spirits.

Mrs. McFarland was not only for a long time the only white woman in that vast and lawless region, but she was for many months the only Protestant missionary in Alaska. The people brought to her in those days all their troubles for solution. If they were sick, they came to her as a physician; if death came to the wigwam, she was called upon to take charge of the funeral. When there was a quarrel in the family, and husbands and wives were estranged, she was the peacemaker to settle their difficulties and bring harmony again to the distracted family circle. In their simple property troubles she was often judge, lawyer, and jury. When feuds sprang up among the small tribes she became peacemaker on a larger scale and became arbiter of their differences. When the Christian Indians called a constitutional convention, they paid a noble tribute to her goodness and wisdom by electing her chairman. She was often called upon to interfere in cases of witchcraft; and when the Vigilance Committee among the miners decided to hang a white man for murder, she was sent for to act as his spiritual adviser. Her fame followed the coast line about to the different tribes, and every canoe carried some note of praise for the missionary. Great chiefs left their homes and came long distances, that they might enter the school of "The woman that loved their people."

Mrs. McFarland soon found to her horror that the very intelligence and blessing which her school, with its teaching and hope, brought to the girls, only put them in greater peril by making them more attractive to the wicked and lawless white men who inhabited the Alaskan towns. Among a people where heathenism crushes out a mother's love and makes her willing to sell her own daughter, soul and body, for a few blankets or a canoe-load of provisions, she found that her brightest and most promising pupils were those who were in the greatest danger. As they improved their advantages in the mission school, it manifested itself in their external appearance. They began to comb their hair more smoothly, to dress more neatly, and to pay more attention to cleanliness in their persons. Their dull, heavy countenances began to light up with intelligence. They became in every way more attractive; and as their attractions increased, white men were the more anxious to buy them for base purposes.

Again and again Mrs. McFarland had to interfere to save her school-girls from lives of sin. This necessity was the cause of her establishing an industrial training school for Indian girls, where they lived together in a "Home," into which she gathered such promising girls as were in danger of being sold, and trained them up to be the future Christian teachers, wives, and mothers of their people.

The story of how she secured her first girl for her "Home" illustrates the fearful odds against which she had to contend and the splendid heroism of her character.

Katy, one of the school-girls, fourteen years of age, who had attended her mission school from the commencement, was about to be taken up the river and sold to the miners by her mother. Mrs. McFarland, hearing of it, started to the family, who lived on an island. When she reached the point where she usually crossed, the tide was so high she could not get over. By signs she attracted Katy's attention, who came across in a canoe. She was sent back for her mother, who came over. There for an hour and a half, seated on a rock by the shore, in a pouring rain, Mrs. McFarland pleaded with the heathen mother until she promised not to take Katy away. But the next week the mother broke her promise, and tried to compel her daughter to accompany her to the mines. The canoe was prepared, and the mother took her seat; the blankets, provisions and younger children were in their places, but the little girl lingered on the shore. The child hesitated, crying and begging most piteously. Finally, when they would have put her in by force, the little girl straightening herself up, said, "Mother, you may kill me, but I will not go with you and live a life of sin."

She then ran into the woods and hid. When her mother had gone, she came out and claimed Mrs. McFarland's protection. And that was the way the first "Girls' Home" in Alaska was started.

CANCER

Its Scientific Treatment and Cure.

Drs. McLeish & Weber, of Cincinnati, O., have made the treatment of Cancer and Tumors a specialty for many years, using no knife or other severe measures. As an evidence of their success they cite the names of a few well known persons who have been cured by them.

Mr. T. E. C. Brinly, Louisville, Ky., President of the Brinly, Miles & Hardy Co., manufacturers of the famous "Brinly Plows," was cured ten years ago cancer of the mouth. Had been operated upon three times before going to them.

Prof. H. McDiarmid, formerly editor Christian Standard, Cincinnati, now Pres. Bethany College, Bethany, W. Va., was cured four years ago of cancer of the face. Before their treatment was applied, the diseased part had been cut out twice, each time recurring in about six months.

Judge R. J. Bowman, of Alexandria, La., was cured of cancer of the right cheek and forehead three years ago. A line addressed to Drs. McLeish & Weber, 419 John St., Cincinnati, O., will secure a 48-page treatise free.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

A CHAT ABOUT PRAYER.

SEVERAL friends have written to me lately asking how they are to gain confidence enough to pray in public. I seem to think that they are very wrong in shrinking from this duty; that if their religion is real, they will be able to take this cross and carry it joyfully, and they will there is something amiss in their hearts, when they hesitate about audible prayer in the presence of an assembly. I am not sure that there is an obligation in the matter. I know people who conscientiously try to pray in meetings, but whose efforts are not to their own comfort, but to the edification of others. They mean well, but that is the most which may be said of them. If they are prompted to lead in prayer by an irrepressible desire to save souls, and to help the Lord's work then, in their imperfection, there is a token of the Holy Spirit's intimation and of his gracious indwelling, and their prayers are not in vain, nor should they be discouraged.

The publican, beating on his breast, unable to lift up his eyes, breathing out: "God be merciful to me a sinner!" made in our Lord's emphatic opinion, a more acceptable prayer than the Pharisee who seems to have been gifted in utterance.

I am concerning myself here about the prayers made by good women in the hearing of others. Far be it from me to throw a dash of cold water on any sensitive soul who feels an inward call to this work, yet I am aware of a timid reluctance, due to inexperience as much as to incapacity. I would discourage only such as feel impelled to a duty which does not beckon them, because they fancy that friends or their minister, or their neighbors are expecting them to take such a step. To our Master we stand or fall. No one of us needs to be under the government in such matters as these, of the dearest friends or the kindest acquaintances in the world. If you do resolve to take part, audibly, in speech or prayer in a meeting, make up your mind to be heard. Do not whisper, mutter, or gasp, or choke, or sob, or break down and cry. I have known women do all these things, and it made every prayer around uncomfortable, as much so as the poor woman herself. To be thoroughly self-controlled is the duty of every one who undertakes to lead others. Speak clearly, through the lips, not through halting teeth. Have something to say, something definite, as when your hungry child asks for a piece of bread, and say it calmly and slowly, not in a hurried way. Wish when you have gotten to the end of your real asking. Do not be circumlocutory. Be straight at the thing you mean. A good example of this brevity and conciseness was given lately at a service one night: New Year's Eve it was, in St. George's church, New York, where Dr. Winsford, conducting a half-hour or so of prayer, had an interval of silent petition broken by single interjected sentences, "and then," "God bless our land," "and guard our homes," "God guide our people," etc.

The way to gain "freedom," to use an unfashioned phrase, is not to think about one's self at all. The instant you begin to think of yourself you are lost. No babe in arms is ever anything but dignified, for the child has not reached the age of self-consciousness. The sweet spontaneity of those who are free from this defect, is a grace to be envied. But it is yours and mine if we will but cultivate it by every means within our power. I question whether any one ever prays well in public who is not often in the secret, and whose private prayers are acts of loving communion with the heavenly Father. One may cultivate, too, the habit of brief ejaculatory prayer, of a swift, unspoken prayer to God, which is flying to him on a track which the lightning cannot pass.

No small occasion should keep us from prayer-meeting. Our household work should be planned with reference to it, and our social engagements ought not to interfere with the hour when it has the right of way. Perhaps we have never fully estimated how much we do to help on the church by our simple, quiet presence at her feasts and her fasts. There, in our places, our whole natures in sympathy with the time and the topic, our inaudible prayers rising like incense to the throne, we may do as much toward bringing the blessing, as if we ourselves spoke. For we do not ever "overcome God's reluctance," we simply bring ourselves in the sphere of his willingness to help and save us.

THE Electrolysis

An Oxygen
Home Remedy
Without Medicines

Often . . . "How?"

Cures Cases Pronounced Incurable

By its new method of introducing oxygen directly to the circulation

A Two Years' Experience.

ASTHMA—O. SALOMON, KAYS, August 24. I have used the Electrolysis family, and for the benefit of nearly two years, and know it to be of great benefit to the afflicted. Personally, it has relieved me of the trouble, from catarrh, also from neuritis arising in the heart, and often a grand, good tonic. It has proved the health of my wife.

CATARRH—In regard to others, from my observation, it has appeared to back the dial of life ten years to a couple over a hundred years of age. The husband was afflicted with it in its worst form (scant breathing, severe coughing, unable to rest in bed). Now he pursues his business as merchant with vigor and ability.

SCIATICA—It has relieved and cured sciatica. I have never thoroughly in another. It has cured hemorrhoids in another, when the scian said he could only alleviate. Sciatica of the kind it has cured. The aching jaw and inflammation face have resolved after one local application.

I can say that it is a safe and easy of application, very good to the body, properly applied. I welcome and recommend it to you. J. O. F. MAYOR, Doctor St. Mark's Episcopal

Requests for Prayer.

At the Converts' Sunday Evening Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission, prayer was offered on Jan. 17, in accordance with the requests of many persons, among whom the following ask the prayers of our readers:

For the Conversion of Relatives and Friends. Unhappy Wife, Brooklyn, N. Y., asks prayer that her husband who is connected with a gambling business, may be converted, and quit his evil associations.—B. C. W., for the conversion of two sons, one of whom is a society favorite and has a wide influence, but is indifferent to religion and inclined to be sceptical.—"Sister in Christ," Titusville, Pa., that a young man and his mother, who are theosophists, may see the error of their ways and turn to the Lord.—E. L. Humansville, Md., that a daughter, a warm-hearted, impulsive girl, might give her heart to Christ and seek grace from him for the conduct of her life.

Praying Mother, Woburn, Mass., for the conversion of her husband and her daughter and son-in-law.—Anxious Husband, Philadelphia, Pa., for the conversion of his wife, and that she may give up her worldly ways and thoughts.—"Heart-broken Mother," Jersey Shore, Pa., that a beloved son who once professed Christ, but has gone to ruin through his propensity to strong drink, may be saved from his bondage and made a new creature in Christ.—A Daughter, York, Pa., for the conversion of her father, two brothers, a sister and a dear friend, and that they might be kept by the power of God from all evil influences; also that a man who once did a great wrong to one who was trying to serve God, may repent and seek pardon through Christ.—Believer, Almiria, Tenn., that a poor old man who is on the brink of the grave, but has not made his peace with God, may be saved even at the eleventh hour.—Subscriber, Birmingham, Ala., that the wayward wife of a Christian minister may give up her evil ways, which are injuring the cause of Christ, and may be made a consistent Christian.—Reader, Danville, Ky., for the conversion of her husband, and that he may lose his desire for strong drink and be enabled to provide for his family; also that his little daughter may be preserved from evil and serve the Lord from her childhood.

Constant Reader, Hardeeville, Fla., that God would touch the heart of a dear brother and a young man who has many opportunities for usefulness, and make them both earnest and faithful Christians.—Friend, Eau Claire, Wis., for the conversion of her daughter, and that her husband who has fallen into grievous sin may repent and renounce his sin and turn to the Lord for pardon and regeneration.—Believer, Moline, Ill., for the conversion of a whole family, father, mother, brothers and sisters, who are all unsaved; also that a family, the head of which is a saloon-keeper, may be brought into the kingdom of Christ.—"Sad-hearted Mother," Delaware, O., that a daughter who is a heavy trial to her husband, may have a new heart given to her.

For the Restoration of Health. Subscriber, Namshaw, Cal., who is suffering from pulmonary troubles, asks prayer for the healing of her body by the Lord's power.—Mother, Baltimore, Md., that the Lord in his mercy would heal her son who is grievously afflicted.—Believer, Chicago, Ill., that God with whom nothing is impossible would restore a beloved mother who has suffered for twenty years.—E. L. S. Hawley, Pa., that God would give healing of body and mind to a very unhappy man whose distress verges on insanity.—Reader, Haxlet, N. J., that she and her daughter might recover their lost sense of hearing.—Reader, Pine Plains, N. Y., for the recovery of an elderly lady who has lost her reason and of her brother who is despondent.—S. H. Y., Helbron, Neb., that her husband who is grievously afflicted may be healed by Christ's power.—Subscriber, Huntington, Pa., that the life of a dear mother may be spared and she may be raised up with renewed health and strength.—Anxious Mother, Millington, Mass., that a beloved son who has become deranged may be restored and permanently recovered.—L. R. H. Shippensburg, Pa., that she and her mother and sister who are all suffering from nervous complaints may recover.—"Sisters in the Lord," Titusville, Pa., that a poor woman suffering from a cancer might be healed.—A. G., Arkadelphia, Ark., for the recovery of a beloved son who is about to submit to a critical operation; he is the sole support of his aged mother and is tenderly loved.—Distressed Believer, Athens, Ala., that the father of a little family may recover his health.—C. Murphy, Ia., that a young man who is studying for the ministry and is very sick, may recover.—The following persons also ask prayers for their restoration to health: J. C. L. Lodge Centre, Minn.; Believer, Kewanee, Ill.; E. L. L. Amboy, Minn.; "Sister in Christ," Mexico, N. Y.; H. A. E., San Diego, Cal.; C. Lisbon, N. H.; T. E. L., Charlton, Ia.; "Comfort," Savannah, Ill.; Reader, Skowhegan, Me.

Persons desiring the prayers of the Converts' Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission should address their letters to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 91 to 102 Bible House, New York.

A Mightier Foe than Armies

OVERCOME BY A BRAVE UNION GENERAL AND HIS FAITHFUL ALLY, DR. WILLIAMS.

From the Sentinel, Cherokee, Kansas.

At the breaking out of the war of the rebellion in 1861, General Wiles was Captain and owner of the then well-known river steamboat, "Charley Potwin," plying between Zanesville and Parkersburg, but he immediately disposed of his boat and became enrolled as lieutenant in the 75th Ohio Infantry. At the battle of Fort Donelson, on February 16, 1862, Lieutenant Wiles was promoted from lieutenant to lieutenant-colonel, for "brave and meritorious conduct on the field," and at the age of thirty-six General Wiles was colonel of his regiment, and while with Sherman, was gazetted brigadier-general.

The General lives the greater part of his time in Halstead, Kansas, though he is much in Windsor, New York, in both of which places he has business interests that require his presence.

Some few years ago General Wiles was attacked by illness, which came very near proving fatal. Typhoid fever, followed by inflammatory rheumatism and then paralysis, made a temporary wreck of the herculean frame, and in view of his advanced age, his anxious friends believed that he was not long for this world. The following is his own account of his illness:

"In the latter part of 1890, I was taken down with a severe attack of typhoid fever, which confined me to my bed for two months. Two months is a long time to be in bed, but I was not to get up yet, for inflammatory rheumatism seized me, and it was worse than the typhoid, for it was more painful. To add to my trouble and make it more interesting, the inflammatory rheumatism was followed by a stroke of paralysis, and I lost almost totally the use of my legs and arms, for I could not walk a step and could not feed myself. It would seem that I had reached the depths of misery, but such was not the case, for my kidneys gave out, and this seemed to be the last straw on the load that was to crush me.

"My friends all thought I would never recover, and though the doctors came to see me and prescribed, it was easy to see that they were but trying to make my pathway to the grave a little more easy, without the remotest hope of recovery, and I looked forward to death with happiness.

"While in this frame of mind, I was advised by friends to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, and began the use of them, taking one pill after each meal, and this I continued for one week, and began to fancy I perceived improvement in my condition. I then increased the dose to two after each meal, and at the end of the second week there was no doubt but what Pink Pills were making me better, so I kept on using them according to directions, and in three months was a well man."

The foregoing is but one of many wonderful cures that have been credited to Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. Diseases which heretofore have been supposed to be incurable, such as locomotor ataxia and paralysis, succumb to this wonderful medicine as readily as the most trifling ailments. In many cases the reported cures have been investigated by the leading newspapers and verified in every possible manner, and in no case has the least semblance of fraud been discovered. Their fame has spread to the far ends of civilization, and there is hardly a drug store in this country or abroad where they cannot be found.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills contain, in a condensed form, all the elements necessary to give new life and richness to the blood and restore shattered nerves. They are an unfailing specific for such diseases as locomotor ataxia, partial paralysis, St. Vitus' dance, sciatica, neuralgia, rheumatism, nervous headache, the after effect of la grippe, palpitation of the heart, pale and sallow complexions, all forms of weakness either in male or female. Pink Pills are sold by all dealers, or will be sent postpaid on receipt of price, 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 (they are never sold in bulk or by the 100), by addressing Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y.

Deaf-Mutes in India.

In the Indian Witness the surprising statement is made that there is in that country a great army of deaf-mutes. A missionary in Calcutta writes: "There are round numbers 200,000 deaf-mutes in all India—the census figures being 196,861 in 1911. Deaf-mutes are taught on two systems—the one by a study of the movements of the lips and surrounding muscles, the other by the movements of the hand, with special reference to the positions of the fingers—shortly, by the lip and hand. There are seven female deaf-mutes to every one male leper in 1881, and in 1891 six male deaf-mutes to two female lepers; which is three deaf-mutes to every one leper girl or woman."

BOOKS RECEIVED.

For Christ's Crown, and other sermons, by James Russell, D.D. A collection of live, vivid, and pointed discourses; cloth binding; pp. 128; price $1.50. Wilbur B. Ketchum, New York, publisher.

No Place for Repentance, by Ellen F. Pinsent, delightful little story of English rural life; pp. 128; cloth covers; price 75 cents. Anson D. F. Randolph & Co., New York, publishers.

First Annual Report of the Commissioners of the Game and Forests of the State of New York. For interesting matter, typographical excellence and beauty of illustration, few public documents can be compared with this handsome volume from the State Printers, the Wynkoop Hallenbeck Crawford Co., of Albany, N. Y. The report is full of subjects of general interest to the community and which readily lend themselves to illustration. The volume abounds in half-tone engravings and contains a number of full page plates, in color, that would delight the student of nature and fishermen especially. These color plates are the work of Sherman F. Denton, the best of the United States Fish Commission, and are marvelously true to life. Altogether, the report is a model one and will be regarded as especially valuable by all students of natural history.

$500 FOR A TOMATO

The Engraving shows the most wonderful Tomato ever offered, which was grown by W. M. Finley, Salem, Ill., who writes: "They grew over 7 ft. high, and I began to pick ripe tomatoes June 24, and had an abundance all summer. Was two weeks earlier than any other variety I ever had, and of the best quality. I had 11 plants, and each one produced from 1 to 2 bushels of nice fruit, many mammoth ones, not a poor one the whole season, and Oct. 15 was still loaded with ripe green fruit."

GIANT EVERBEARING TOMATO is entirely new and a wonder to all. After once grown you will have no others. We own all the seed there is, and will pay $500 for 1 of them weighing 3 lbs. Plant some, you may get the 3 lb. tomato. Instructions with seed how to grow them.

FIRST IN MARKET CABBAGE is the earliest and in the world as you will have heads weeks before your neighbors.

GIANT FLAT DUTCH is the largest Cabbage of all. Is all head and always sets to head, weighing 50 lbs.

.. Wonderfully Adapted for a Novel Money-Making Entertainment ..

THESE people are certainly enjoying themselves, and no wonder, for they are listening to one of the most varied entertainments ever given in a private parlor. They were first, as you will perceive by the accompanying programme, entertained by a piano solo. They then listened to a popular and patriotic song. The next selection was a banjo solo, after that a song by the baritone, J. W. Myers, "Starlight, Starbright;" then a recitation, "The Imitation of a Street Fakir." This was followed by a male quartette. Then came the very popular and famous Billy Golden with his plantation song, "Bye, Bye, Ma Honey;" following that a cornet duet, and then the French national song, "La Marseillaise," by Signor F. A. Giannini.

We have introduced in this advertisement the whole programme as rendered at this evening's "Home Entertainment;" each selection was a reproduction of the original. You listen to the quality and strains of the cornet; you absolutely hear the picking of the banjo, while the quartette singing and the solo singing are the natural reproductions of the real artists.

So true to life are these reproductions that if you were to come into the hall and see the people gathered together and yet not know that the evening's entertainment was given by a reproducing or, as it is perhaps better known, a talking machine, you would really never know it unless you had a chance to enter the room.

This special talking machine, the Berliner Gramophone, is the newest and the Best. Its results are better than those of the regular $100 talking machines. We have made this result possible because of the discovery of a new way to record sound. It is recorded upon a flat disc and finally placed upon hard rubber, which makes it indestructible, very easy to handle, and, for the first time, thoroughly adapted for family use. These discs cost 60 cents singly, or $6 per dozen, and, as the variety is almost unlimited, you can have a never-failing source of pleasure and entertainment. Great men and great artists will be recorded, and you will thus be able to hear, in your own home, people of national and international reputation.

There is no musical instrument that the Gramophone does not reproduce. This spring motor machine, which runs by clockwork, we sell for $25 express prepaid to any point east of the Rocky Mountains. To points beyond we allow Denver express rates. Two records are included with each machine.

We guarantee Perfect Satisfaction, and will return your money, less express charges, if it is not satisfactory. It winds easily through three records without rewinding, weighs only fifteen pounds, and has the great advantage of being always ready for use, because its power is within itself.

We have two other styles for $10 and $15; the $10 machine is run by hand, and is furnished with ear tubes for two people to hear. The $15 machine is also run by hand, but is supplied with a governor, so that the speed is regulated, and after it is turned as fast as necessary cannot be turned any faster. This makes the hand machine sure to give you a good reproduction, even in the hands of a novice.

Questions and Answers.

B. R., Greensburg, Pa. Did the Mosaic law sanction polygamy or was it a sin for the Hebrew to have more than one wife?

The law dealt with it as it dealt with slavery and other evils it found in existence. It operated against them by making them difficult and onerous. It enacted that if a Hebrew married more than one wife, he must not show partiality and he must not impoverish the first wife to enrich the second, nor must he neglect the first wife to honor the second. Both or all wives must be treated alike. Few men would marry second and third wives under such obligations and, as a matter of fact few did; and in the instances recorded (such as 1. Samuel 1: 6), they were the cause of domestic discomfort. God by his providence, thus showing that polygamy was not approved by him.

Dr. H., Westboro, O. 1. What does the delivering to Satan, mentioned in 1. Cor. 5: 5 and 1. Tim. 1: 20, refer to? 2. How can God be said (as in Isa. 45: 7) to create evil?

1. The phrase has caused much speculation, but there is no doubt that it indicates some form of excommunication. The man is put out of the church, the fold of God, temporarily, on account of his wrongdoing. It was probably so persistent and inexcusable that the Apostle despaired of Christian influences effecting a change. He must be made to feel how wicked he was, and by the church expelling him they practically gave him up for the time. This was probably regarded as delivering him to Satan. They ceased to bring Christian love to bear upon him, and let him go as a hopeless case. In at least one of the cases, it is thought, the discipline had a good effect, if, as is probable, the offender is the one referred to in 1. Cor. 2: 6-8. 2. Evil in that passage is evidently put in contrast with peace. It doubtless meant that God had in his power the means of inflicting punishment. The writers of the Old Testament recognized God's hand in everything. When war and social disturbance came upon the nation, the ordinary people would speak of it as an evil that had befallen them, and might blame their rulers. The prophet refers them to God and reminds them of their sins. The Lord sends both peace and war, the good and the evil.

F. V., Flint, Mich. Is there not a contradiction between the statement in Deut. 24: 16 and several other passages, such as 1. Kings 21: 29; 11. Kings 10: 7, 10?

No, the passage in Deuteronomy is a law forbidding the Hebrews to punish a son for his father's sin. He was not to be even brought to trial as a hostage. He must answer for his own sins and no others. The instances you cite from Kings were not instances of criminal procedure, but of national and dynastic convulsion. In the one case the calamity was temporarily averted when the king humbled himself, but it came afterward. In the other case there was a revolution and the successful rebel made a wholesale slaughter, as was common in Oriental revolutions.

C. H., Iron Mount, Mo. 1. Was the experience Paul describes (Rom. 7: 23) his own? 2. Is it right to prefix the title "Rev." to a minister's name?

1. The question is disputed. To us, it seems probable that it was his past experience. When he tried to live by the law he found rebellion in his nature. The law was good. There was no doubt of that. But when he tried to do what the law commanded he failed. The good that he wanted to do he did not do, but he did the evil that he hated. His conscience was right and his intentions were good, but, as it is with so many, his life fell short. The conflict was distressing. His cry: "O, wretched man that I am!" shows how he suffered. He wanted power to live up to his ideal. At last he found it in Christ. His delight is shown in his exclamation: "I thank God through Jesus Christ!" 2. It is merely courtesy. Several ministers, however, have represented it. Dr. A. L. Gordon, Mr. Spurgeon, and others prefix the title "pastor."

M. A. T., Warren, Pa. Do you think the suicide who was once converted, might be saved, or do you think he taking his own life he would lose his inheritance in heaven?

If he ever had an inheritance in heaven we do not believe that he would lose it by taking his own life. Persons who are united to Christ by faith and have become heirs of God, would not commit suicide, as no murderer (and a suicide is a self-murderer) has eternal life abiding in him (see 1. John 3: 15). If such a person took his own life he is certain that his reason had become unbalanced by grief, or trouble, or anxiety, and that he was irresponsible. Any person who, having his reason and his mental powers unimpaired, deliberately kills himself, would give evidence by his act that he was not a true Christian, and therefore had never an inheritance in heaven.

Subscriber A. A., Quebec, Can. Did Judas purchase a field, as stated in Acts 1: 18, or did the priests purchase it, as stated in Matt. 27: 7?

It is probable that the priests purchased it. Peter in his speech recorded in Acts gave the net result. Judas made no gain by his treachery. All that he did by it was to provide a field to bury strangers in.

John McF., Catlin, N. Y. 1. Where did Solomon die and where can the record be found? 2. How long did the Christian Church continue to worship in the Jewish Temple?

1. The Bible record of his death is in 1. Kings 11: 43, and 11. Chronicles 9: 31. It simply relates that he slept with his fathers and was buried in the City of David. Farrar narrates the tradition current among the Jews as to his death. It is that Solomon went up to the Temple to worship. He stood there engaged in prayer, a picturesque figure with his long, white hair floating over the imperial mantle, and wearing the gold crown that Bathsheba, his mother, gave him. As he stood leaning on his staff, death came to him, but was written. Baptism takes the place of circumcision only so far forth as it is initiatory. Whether administered to infants, or to adult believers only, it is an expression of the beginning of the life under the Christian dispensation. The infant, by the act of its parents, is dedicated to Christ and made so far as an external act can make it, nominally a Christian. The adult believer, by his own act, makes it at the beginning of his life as a public confession of Christ. In both it is initiatory as circumcision was. The child, by circumcision, became nominally and outwardly "a son of Abraham," but if he grew up disobedient to the law he was no true son of Abraham. The child baptized, or the adult believer baptized, becomes nominally a Christian, but if he does not live Christ's life he is no true Christian. 2. Dr. Talmage was not immersed in the Jordan, but he immersed a candidate who expressed a wish to undergo the ceremony.

Replying to "Reader's" letter, Marion Harland writes:

Coffee-cake will not keep long; being made of butter and milk, both of which "perish with the keeping" as well as the "using." I have eaten black (i. e. wedding fruit) cake, ten years old, that was good. If kept wrapped in tin-foil and in a tight tin box there is no reason why it should not keep half a century.

We believe this letter will kindle a response in the breast of many a reader who may be afflicted with a "temper."

W. C., Eaton Rapids, Mich. In your answer to D. G. M., Tracy, Cal., your advice was very good, if suppression is what he needs, but I think he needs extermination of the temper, and as I suffered from the same infirmity for forty-four years, I can tell him how I was cured instantaneously. Evil temper was my besetting sin. Oh, how I have agonized in prayer that the Lord would help me to overcome and he did help me, but there would be times when I failed, and I was almost in despair of ever having complete victory, but over five years ago the Lord revealed to me that the blood of Jesus would be hopelessly involved, recalling the famous exposition of the law of consanguinity (by an English writer), as it applied to the case of a bishop who, being a widower with family, married a widow with a family. The had children and the three generations were living simultaneously under the episcopal roof. The exposition—a marvel of lucidity—was: "His'n can marry her'n; and her'n can marry his'n. But their'n can't marry each other, nor his'n her'n."

Reader, Glidden, I. We have a new church organization. The young church started out with much zeal and spirit, and built a handsome house or worship, and all went well for a while, but a spirit of dissension arose over church organ. A part of the congregation objected to having organ music, but the minister and the majority of the laity wished to have organ. It was left to a vote, and was decided about a two to one vote in favor of the organ. And now, as we are trying to hold a revival meeting, some of the anti-organists are throwing cold water on the meetings by claiming that the organ is in the way of the spirituality of the services.

The organ is now so universally used and recognized as a great aid to devotional singing that it is surprising to find people still opposing it; but such prejudices are dying out. The Psalms were set to instrumental music, the organ being a specially chosen instrument (see 1. 150: 4). It is difficult to understand how an instrument could stand in the way of a church's spiritual advancement if it be used properly and with a due appreciation of the sanctity of the occasion.

D. F. E., Charlottesville, Va. Does not the fact that the camel, the elephant, the sheep, and the deer are practically in the same condition that it were thousands of years ago disprove the doctrine of Evolution?

No, it simply proves that in that period there have made no progress in developing into higher order. If they are capable of high development, we can see no signs of it. If their ancestors developed from lower forms of life, the present representatives of the species are not continuing to develop.

W. D. M., Paris, Tenn. Why did John Baptist send his disciples to Jesus know whether he was the Christ, whether they were to look for another (Matt. 11: 2-4.)

It may have been for their own satisfaction. But John was himself probably in doubt. If, as is likely, he shared the Jewish expectation that the Messiah would be a king, he must have been surprised, as the disciples were, that Christ did not declare himself. He may have wondered, too, at his being left in prison. Christ kept John's disciples with him to witness his miracles and preaching and then sent them back to report what they had seen, in order that John might understand how fulfilled the prophecies.

L. E. B., Downs, Kan. 1. How can there be sins of omission and commission? 2. Who are the dead referred to as being the dead in Luke 9: 60? 3. Is it right for a woman to speak in church (see 1. Cor. 14: 34, 35.)

1. A sin of omission is when a man fails to obey, or do his duty, as when he has an opportunity to relieve a brother in distress and fails to do it. A sin of commission is a sin committed as when a man tells a lie. 2. The burial in Palestine were very elaborate affairs involving foolish ceremonies and much waste of time. The man who wanted to give the funeral of his father showed that he was not sufficiently appreciative of the privilege being with Christ. Such ceremonies at funerals might be left to those who were not spiritually quickened. 3. See answer to Matron, in this journal on Jan. 6, page 10.

Mrs. H. F. R., New Haven, Ct. Several times I have seen in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the name "Krikorian," the last time as that of a man massacred in Turkey, with his wife and children. A young man by that name graduated at Yale, New Haven, preached in church twice when we needed a supply, while here, made his home with my family. I have an autograph I find in an album, the property of our grandson.

The name is by no means uncommon in the East. There are several persons of that name now in the United States.

RUINS OF THE FIRST SPANISH SETTLEMENT IN PERU.

The story of the conquest of Peru by Pizarro, in the early part of the sixteenth century, is one of the romances of history. It was for a time the centre of Spanish power. Our illustration shows all that remains of the first settlement built by the Spaniards, who had selected sites which it was hoped would in time become great and populous cities. The photograph is a reminder of the Spanish conquest—a group of roofless, untenanted dwellings, whose builders and occupants are now only a shadowy memory.

the staff supported the corpse. The priests saw that he was dead, but feared to touch him, because on his dead hand was the famous ring with which he had worked wonders of sorcery. But a mouse ran out from its hole and gnawed at the leather at the foot of the staff until it slipped and the great king fell on the floor and his crown rolled in the dust. 2. It is probable that the Christians went individually to the Temple to worship until the city was besieged. Then, heeding Christ's warning (Luke 21: 20, 21), they fled. Paul was worshipping in the Temple (Acts 21: 27), near the close of his ministry about the year 58. The Temple was destroyed in A. D. 70.

M. C. R., Tadmor, O. Is there a book or work of any kind on the United States Navy, one that gives the history, building, cost, etc., of the different vessels?

A. W. McAllum, La Verne, Tex. 1. Why do persons who claim that baptism takes in the New Testament the place that circumcision took in the Old Testament administer the rite to female children while circumcision was for males only? 2. Was Dr. Talmage immersed in the Jordan?

1. There is Apostolic precedent for baptizing women (see Acts 16: 15). Woman's place in the new dispensation is higher than it was in the old. All through the Old Testament there is evident implication of her inferiority; but in the new, her equality with man before God was coming to recognition and it has been steadily advancing since the New Testament Christ could cleanse from all sin, and that if I trusted God entirely to do this work for me leaving it all to him, he would do it, (for no man even with the help of God could take a particle of sin from his own nature.) I then went to God in prayer, making a full consecration and surrender of self and all that I had, or expected to have, or should have, and it was done and well done, for I have kept sweet ever since, and what God has done for me he will do for everybody if they fulfil the conditions.

W. W. B., Andover, Me. Are there any of the Armenian children being brought to this country? It seems to me that there ought to be an extensive work done in bringing them here and getting them into pleasant homes. Can't there be something done to interest our churches?

In the future, some such movement may be tried, but at present it is impracticable. All the missionaries can do just now is to strive to keep the orphans from falling into Mohammedan hands, where escape or rescue would be almost hopeless.

Constant Reader, Weston, Mo. Where, when, and by whom was the first Sunday School started?

By Robert Raikes, in Gloucester, England, in the year 1784.

Reader, Pa. Is it lawful or unlawful for a man to marry his father's third wife's daughter?

Unlawful, if she be the father's daughter as well, but lawful if she be no blood relation but the daughter of the third wife by a former marriage. But in either case it would generally be regarded as an inexpedient marriage. The husband of the daughter would be his own father's son and son-in-law, and his own wife's half brother by marriage. In a second generation the exact degree of relationship

How the Central Union Mission of Washington, D. C., Solves the Problem of Carrying the Gospel to the Masses.

ONE of the familiar spectacles of the streets on the outskirts of the National Capital is that depicted in the picture on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week. It is reproduced from an actual photograph taken specially for this journal. The Central Union Mission, which is practically the city evangelization society of Washington, sends out its wagon on Sunday afternoons and week-day evenings every year from the beginning of May to the end of October, visiting every section of the city. Gospel speakers and Gospel singers with their the meetings at one or other branch of the Mission, and have there been led to Christ. Many conversions have occurred, too, at these open-air meetings. At this very place a poor girl one evening last summer went to the side of the wagon and asked for some one to pray with her. In tearful voice she said, "Since mother died, I have had no one to help me live right." She was pointed to the Saviour, and her sub-branches of mission and educational work. With the co-operation of the Bowery Mission, she has established a Sewing School for girls under fifteen years of age, and it has already met with marked success. It meets every Monday and Thursday at 3 P.M. in the Bowery Mission Hall, and the programme includes a brief Gospel service, singing, and prayer, followed by two hours of sewing lessons. The attendance already averages between fifty and sixty girls, and the number is steadily increasing. Half a score nationalities are represented. The girls have already learned to love their gentle and efficient teacher, and the discipline is perfect. It is believed that the Sewing School will soon number over a hundred pupils.

Speaking of the work among the young girls in which she is now enthusiastically occupied, Miss Hoge said to the writer:

"It is our little children who are making society, and who will soon be on the highway of life, walking worthily and helpfully onward, or filling our almshouses, penitentiaries, insane asylums, and prisons, according to the direction we give to their lives. The next generation lies like plastic clay in our hands. The babies of a few short years ago now pass their wasted lives in our state institutions, or struggle outside with poverty and temptation. The tramps, the thriftless workers, whose work

CHEERING LOWLY LIVES.

A Young Christian Worker's Labors Among the Neglected East-side Girls

N the great cosmopolitan hive of East-side New York, every nationality under the sun is represented in the tenements and slums. For many years, the Bowery Mission has been doing an excellent work among these people. Its Gospel services have been largely attended, not only by the waifs and strays of the Bowery proper, but by people from the nearby tenements, and many have attended the meetings in the Mission Hall, and have been led to nobler ambitions and better lives. But while these efforts were being put forth in behalf of the men of the East-side, it was felt that there was an equal if not a greater need of similar efforts in behalf of the women and girls of that densely populated section.

A few weeks ago, Miss Ruby Maude Hoge, a young Southern lady and a Chris-when we get it, is anything but good; the hundreds of defaulters who are exposed, and the thousands who tamper with doubtful ways as yet undiscovered; the army of men and women, unsuccessful and discouraged, because out of place, or untrained for their work—all these were the victims of their environment. Can any one doubt the difference to these unfortunates, if half the money, time, and thought, now spent in supporting them, and defending ourselves from their mistakes, had been spent in loving, intelligent care of their bodies, brains, and hearts, at the time when every habit of life is receiving its direction? The children which compose my larger Sewing Class are many of them saturated with sin, and apparently dead to every ray of refinement or gentility—having lived their poor little lives on doorsteps, in alley-ways—kicked and beaten about cruelly by brutal parents, and hardened by constant contact with surroundings which beggar description. Their eagerness to gain admittance into my domain, their affectionate outbursts of appreciation for the stories I relate to them—and the various ways by which I strive to inculcate knowledge and truth in them—would touch the hearts of many in the outside world, who know so little of what we see hourly. I find encouragement with each succeeding day in the interest which my girls exhibit, and the tender and warm, yet crude, expressions of their love. It seems so sad and pitiful that these hundreds of little waifs cannot be gathered up and placed in a different and purer atmosphere, having the advantages of culture and education. When we rise to the heights our poets would have us, and believe that children do come 'trailing clouds of glory,' and that for them as for us, 'tis only God can be had for the asking, we shall plant worthily in our beautiful child-garden, and also reap as we sow."

THE DINING-ROOM OF THE CENTRAL UNION MISSION.

organ thus go forth literally into "the highways and lanes" to proclaim to those who are out of the way the glad tidings of salvation. Audiences such as that shown in the picture are gathered in some sections, while in others, the hearers are men and women of other types. The mission workers have the same message for all, believing that for the aristocrat and the plebeian, the educated and the ignorant, the rich and the poor, the supreme need is the same. During the nine years that the wagon has been going out on its errand of Gospel service, thousands of persons have heard the message of the Cross preached and sung, who never enter the house of God, and who in the midst of Christian privileges are almost as ignorant of the real truths of Christianity as are the heathen of Africa. Among the crowds which gather, however, there are some to whom the Gospel message is familiar, but who through poverty, or the pressure of life's burdens, or the power of temptation, or the bonds of dissipation, have deserted the God of their fathers and are leading godless lives. Many a time the speakers and singers have seen as they glanced over the crowd, the tear prompted by childhood's memories, hastily brushed away and the eager, almost incredulous look of one who hears how readily God welcomes the returning prodigal and restores to the repentant backslider the joy of his salvation. None can ever tell how many, to whom such a message is a glad surprise, have heard it from that wagon, who would never have heard it in any other way.

The section in which the wagon stood when our photograph was taken is near the river, one of the poorest quarters of the city, where the white and colored population is mixed up indiscriminately, and all shades of color are seen, from the pure Caucasian to the blackest negro. During the summer and fall the wagon visits it regularly and audiences of three to four hundred usually gather. The meetings in this section have been most successful, a large number of both men and women who heard the Gospel from the wagon have been induced to attend

HARBOR OF HOME.

Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., } "Go home to thy friends, and tell them how on the Text: Mark 5: 19. . . . } great things the Lord hath done for thee."

HERE are a great many people longing for some grand sphere in which to serve God. They admire Luther at the Diet of Worms, and only wish that they had some such great opportunity in which to display their Christian prowess. They admire Paul making Felix tremble, and they only wish that they had some such grand occasion in which to preach righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come. All they want is an opportunity to exhibit their Christian heroism. Now the apostle comes to us and he practically says: "I will show you a place where you can exhibit all that is grand and beautiful and glorious in Christian character, and that is the domestic circle."

If one is not faithful in an insignificant sphere he will not be faithful in a resounding sphere. If Peter will not help the cripple at the gate of the temple, he will never be able to preach three thousand souls into the kingdom at the Pentecost. If Paul will not take pains to instruct in the way of salvation the sheriff of the Philippian dungeon, he will never make Felix tremble. He who is not faithful in a skirmish would not be faithful in an Armageddon. The fact is, we are all placed in just the position in which we can most grandly serve God, and we ought not to be chiefly thoughtful about some sphere of usefulness which we may after awhile gain, but the all-absorbing question with you and with me ought to be: "Lord, what wilt thou have me (now and here) to do?"

There is one word in my text around which the most of our thoughts will to-day revolve. That word is HOME. Ask ten different men the meaning of that word and they will give you ten different definitions. To one it means love at the hearth, it means plenty at the table, industry at the workstand, intelligence at the books, devotion at the altar. To him it means a greeting at the door and a smile at the chair. Peace hovering like wings. Joy clapping its hands with laughter. Life a tranquil lake. Pillowed on the ripples sleep the shadows.

Ask another man what home is, and he will tell you it is want, looking out of a cheerless fire-grate and kneading hunger in an empty bread-tray. The damp air shivering with curses. No Bible on the shelf. Children, robbers and murderers in embryo. Vile songs their lullaby. Every face a picture of ruin. Want in the background and sin staring from the front. No Sabbath wave rolling over that door-sill. Vestibule of the pit. Shadow of infernal walls. Furnace for forging everlasting chains. Faggots for an unending funeral pile. Awful word! It is spelled with curses, it weeps with ruin, it chokes with woe, it sweats with the death-agony of despair.

The word "home" in the one case means everything bright. The word "home" in the other case means everything terrible.

I shall speak to you of home as a test of character, home as a refuge, home as a political safeguard, home as a school, and home as a type of heaven.

And in the first place I remark that home is a powerful test of character. The disposition in public may be in gay costume, while in private it is in dishabille. As play-actors may appear in one way on the stage and may appear in another way behind the scenes, so private character may be very different from public character. Private character is often public character turned wrong side out. A man may receive you into his parlor as though he were a distillation of smiles, and yet his heart may be a swamp of nettles. There are business men who all day long are mild and courteous and genial and good-natured in commercial life, keeping back their irritability and their petulance and their discontent; but at nightfall the dam breaks, and scolding pours forth in floods and freshets.

The reason men do not display their bad temper in public is because they do not want to be knocked down. There are men who hide their petulance and their irritability just for the same reason that they do not let their notes go to protest; it does not pay. Or for the same reason that they do not want a man in their stock company to sell his stock at less than the right price, lest it depreciate the value. As at sunset the wind rises, so after a sunshiny day there may be a tempestuous night. There are people who in public act the philanthropist, who at home act the Nero, with respect to their slippers and their gown.

Audubon, the great ornithologist, with gun and pencil, went through the forests of America to bring down and to sketch the beautiful birds, and after years of toil and exposure completed his manuscript and put it in a trunk in Philadelphia for a few days of recreation and rest, and came back and found that the rats had utterly destroyed the manuscript; but without any discomposure and without any fret or bad temper, he again picked up his gun and pencil and visited again all the great forests of America and reproduced his immortal work. And yet there are people with the ten-thousandth part of that loss who are utterly irreconcilable, who, at the loss of a pencil or an article of raiment, will blow as long and sharp as a north-east storm.

Now, that man who is affable in public and who is irritable in private is making a fraudulent over-issue of stock, and he is as bad as a bank that might have four or five hundred thousand dollars of bills in circulation with no specie in the vault. Let us learn "to show piety at home." If we have it not there we have it not anywhere. If we have not genuine grace in the family circle, all our outward and public plausibility merely springs from a fear of the world or from the slimy, putrid pool of our own selfishness. I tell you the home is a mighty test of character. What you are at home you are everywhere, whether you demonstrate it or not.

Again, I remark that home is a refuge. Life is the United States army on the national road to Mexico, a long march with ever and anon a skirmish and a battle. At eventide we pitch our tent and stack our arms: we hang up the war cap and lay our head on the knapsack; we sleep until the morning bugle calls us to marching and action. How pleasant it is to rehearse the victories and the surprises and the attacks of the day, seated by the still capture of the home circle!

Yea, life is a stormy sea. With shivered masts and torn sails and hulk aleak, we put into the harbor of home. Blessed harbor! there we go for repairs in the dry dock of quiet life. The candle in the window is to the toiling man the light-house guiding him into port. Children go forth to meet their fathers as pilots at the Narrows take the hand of ships. The door-sill of the home is the wharf where heavy life is unladen.

There is the place where we may talk of what we have done without being charged with self-adulation. There is the place where we may lounge without being thought ungraceful. There is the place where we may express affection without being thought silly. There is the place where we may forget our annoyances and exasperations and troubles. Forlorn earth-pilgrim! no home? Then die. That is better. The grave is brighter and grander and more glorious than this world, with no tent from marchings, with no harbor from the storm, with no place to rest from this scene of greed and gouge and loss and gain. God pity the man or woman who has no home!

Further, I remark, that home is a political safeguard. The safety of the state must be built on the safety of the home. The Christian hearthstone is the only corner-stone for a republic. The virtues cultured in the family circle are an absolute necessity for the state. If there be not enough moral principle to make the family adhere, there will not be enough political principle to make the state adhere. "No home" means the Goths and Vandals, means the nomads of Asia, means the Numidians of Africa, changing from place to place according as the pasture happens to change. Confounded be all those Babels of iniquity which would overthrow and destroy the home. The same storm that upsets the ship in which the family sails will sink the frigate of the Constitution. Jails and penitentiaries and armies and navies are not our best defence. The door of the home is the best fortress. Household utensils are the best artillery, and the chimneys of our dwelling-houses are the grandest monuments of safety and triumph. No home. No republic.

Further, I remark, that home is a school. Old ground must be turned up with subsoil plough, and it must be harrowed and re-harrowed, and then the crop will not be as large as that of the new ground with less culture. Now, youth and childhood are new ground, and all the influences thrown over their heart and life will come up in after-life luxuriantly. Every time you have given a smile of approbation—all the good cheer of your life will come up again in the geniality of your children. And every ebullition of anger and every uncontrollable display of indignation will be fuel to their disposition twenty or thirty or forty years from now—fuel for a bad fire a quarter of a century from this.

Oh, make your home the brightest place on earth, if you would charm your children to the high path of virtue and rectitude and religion! Do not always turn the blinds the wrong way. Let the light which puts gold on the gentian and spots the pansy pour into your dwellings. Do not expect the little feet to keep step to a dead march.

Get you no hint of cheerfulness from grasshopper's leap and lamb's frisk, and quail's whistle, and garrulous streamlet, which, from the rock at the mountain-top clear down to the meadow ferns under the shadow of the steep, comes looking for the steepest place to leap off at, and talking just to hear itself talk? If all the skies hurtled with tempest, and everlasting storm wandered over the sea, and every mountain stream went raving mad, frothing at the mouth with mad foam, and there were nothing but simoons blowing among the hills, and there were neither lark's carol nor humming-bird's trill, nor waterfall's dash, but only bear's bark, and panther's scream, and wolf's howl, then you might well gather into your homes only the shadows. But when God has strewn the earth and the heavens with beauty and with gladness, let us take into our home circles all innocent hilarity, a brightness, and all good cheer. A dar home makes bad boys and bad girls, a preparation for bad men and bad women.

Above all, my friends, take into your homes Christian principle. Can it be that in any of the comfortable homes of my congregation the voice of prayer is never lifted? What! No supplication, night for protection? What! No thanksgiving in the morning for care? How will you answer God in the day of judgment with reference to your children? Oh, you do not inculcate Christian principle in the hearts of your children, and you do not warn them against evil, and you do not invite them to holiness and to God, and they wander off into dissipation and into infidelity, and at last make shipwreck of their immortal souls, on the deathbed and in the day of judgment they will curse you!

My mind runs back to one of the best of early homes. Prayer, like a roof over Peace, like an atmosphere in it. Parent personifications of faith in trial and comfort in darkness. The two pillars of the earthly home long ago crumbled to dust. But shall I ever forget that earthly home? Yes, when the flower forgets the sun that warms it. Yes, when the man forgets the star that guided him. Yes, when love has gone out on the heart altar and memory has emptied its urn into forgetfulness. Then, home of my childhood, I will forget thee; the family altar of a father's importunity and mother's tenderness, the voices of affection, the funerals of our dead; father at mother, with interlocked arms like intertwining branches of trees making a perpetual arbor of love and peace and kindness—then I will forget thee—then, and only then. You know, my brother, that hundred times you have been kept out of sin by the memory of such a scene as I have been describing. You have often had raging temptations, but you know what has held you with supernatural grasp. I tell you a man who has had such a good home as that never gets over it, and a man who has had a bad ear home never gets over that.

Again, I remark that home is a type of heaven. To bring us to that home Christ left his home. Far up and far back the history of heaven there came a period when its most illustrious citizen was about to absent himself. I think that the window and the balconies were thronged, as that the pearly beach was crowded with those who had come to see him sail out of the harbor of light into the ocean beyond. Out and out and out, and on and on and on, and down and down and down he sped, until one night, with one to greet him, he arrived. His disembarkation so unpretending, so quiet that was not known on earth until the excitement in the cloud gave intimation that something grand and glorious had happened. Who comes there? From what port did he sail? Why was this the place of his destination? I question the shepherds, I question the camel drivers, I question the angels. I have found on He was an exile. But the world has had plenty of exiles. Abraham, an exile from Ur of the Chaldees; Mazzini, from Rome; Emmet, an exile from Ireland; Victor Hugo, an exile from France; Kossuth, an exile from Hungary. But this one whom I speak to-day had such resounding farewell and came into such chilling reception—for not even an hostler went out with his lantern to help him in—that he more to be celebrated than any other expatriated one of earth or heaven.

At our best estate we are only pilgrims and strangers here. "Heaven is our home. Death will never knock at the door of the mansion, and in all that country there is but a single grave. How glad parents are holiday time to gather their children home again! But I have noticed that almoways there is a son or a daughter absent—absent from home, perhaps absent from the country, perhaps absent from the world. Oh, how glad our Heavenly Father will be when he gets all his children home with him in heaven! And how delightful will be for brothers and sisters to meet after long separation! Once they parted at the door of the tomb; now they meet at the door of immortality. Once they saw only "through a glass, darkly;" now it is "face to face." corruption, incorruption; mortality, immortality. Where are now all their sins and sorrows and troubles? Overwhelmed in the Red Sea of death while they passed through dryshod.

Gates of pearl, capstones of amethyst, thrones of dominion do not stir my soul so much as the thought of home. Once there, earthly sorrows howl like storms and roll like seas. Home! Let thrones rot and empires wither. Home! Let the world die in an earthquake struggle and be buried amid procession of planets and dirge of spheres. Home! Let everlasting ages roll in irresistible sweep. Home! No sorrow, no crying. No tears. No death. But home, sweet home; home, beautiful home, everlasting home, home with each other, home with angels, home with God.

One night, lying on my lounge, when very tired, my children all around about me in full romp and hilarity and laughter—on the lounge, half awake and half asleep, I dreamed this dream: I was in a far country. It was not Persia, although more than Oriental luxuriance crowned the cities. It was not the tropics, although more than tropical fruitfulness filled the gardens. It was not Italy, although more than Italian softness filled the air. And I wandered around looking for thorns and nettles, but I found that none of them grew there, and I saw the sun rise, and I watched to see it set, but it sank not. And I saw the people in holiday attire, and I said: "When will they put off this and put on workmen's garb and again delve in the mine or swelter at the forge?" but they never put off the holiday attire. And I wandered in the suburbs of the city to find the place where the dead sleep, and I looked all along the line of the beautiful hills, the place where the dead might most blissfully sleep; and I saw towers and castles, but not a mausoleum or a monument or a white slab could I see. And I went into the chapel of the great town and I said:

"Where do the poor worship and where are the hard benches on which they sit?" And the answer was made me: "We have no poor in this country." And then I wandered out to find the hovels of the destitute, and I found mansions of amber and ivory and gold, but not a tear could I see, not a sigh could I hear, and I was bewildered and I sat down under the branches of a great tree and I said, "Where am I? And whence comes all this scene?" And then out from among the leaves, and up the flowery paths, and across the bright streams there came a beautiful group, thronging all about me, and as I saw them come I thought I knew their step, and as they shouted I thought I knew their voices; but then they were so gloriously arrayed in apparel, that I bowed as stranger to stranger. But when again they clapped their hands and shouted, "Welcome, welcome!" the mystery all vanished, and I found that time had gone and eternity had come, and we were all together again in our new home in heaven. And I looked around and I said: "Are we all here?" and the voices of many generations responded, "All here!" And while tears of gladness were raining down our cheeks, and the branches of the Lebanon cedars were clapping their hands, and the towers of the great city were chiming their welcome, we all together began to leap and shout and sing: "Home, home, home!"

INDIA'S VICEROY APPEALS.

Lord Elgin Cables "The Christian Herald" that All Aid for that Famine-Stricken Land will be Welcomed—Famine and Pestilence Spreading.

In response to a cable message of inquiry from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, addressed to His Excellency, the Right Hon. the Earl of Elgin and Kincardine, Viceroy of India, relative to the actual condition of affairs in the famine districts, the extent of the suffering and the need of help. Dr. Louis Klopsch, the proprietor of this journal, has received the following cablegram:

Calcutta, Feb. 2, 1897.
Your cablegram received. The Famine Fund Committee will welcome all contributions. Money is preferred to grain.
(Signed) VICEROY.

This important dispatch by cable, from the ruler of over 300,000,000 human beings, puts at rest all doubt as to the duty of helping the famine-stricken people of India. It also clearly indicates what form the relief should take.

Panic has already begun among the population in some of the cities, especially in Bombay, where 200 are dying daily of plague. The churches have held special services for humiliation and prayer to the Almighty to stay the plague. Nearly half a million persons have fled in terror from the city, and many have carried the deadly infection to districts hitherto free from its visitations. Karachi, the rival seaport, and Bandra have both already suffered severely. Bandra is probably the worst of all the famine-stricken districts, the destitution being almost universal; indeed, one correspondent states that "practically the entire population is without food." He pictures them as crowds of starving beggars, mere skeletons, weakly screaming for succor.

thousands. To reach these remote sections with relief is now the task of government officials and missionaries alike, but it is a most gigantic, not to say perilous undertaking.

The missionaries are remaining faithful at their posts everywhere, although native merchants, rich Europeans and even officials are moving away to the safer localities. Food and medicine are greatly needed—food most of all, however, as it is the famine that invites the pestilence in every instance. It is essentially a "poor man's plague," since the victims almost all belong to the lower classes. One of the most pitiful sights, as a correspondent reports, is the multitudes of children who, left alone by the death of their relatives, are taken in and sheltered by kind natives. These latter, however, are too poor to feed the little strangers, and so the children, more like skeletons than human beings, droop and die without a murmur, their wistful yet uncomplaining eyes looking sadly at the world that has nothing for them but death by starvation.

A great shock, which has added to the burden of suffering, is the revelation that the reserve famine fund which the Indian government was generally believed to have provided in anticipation of such a visitation as the present, has practically no existence. It has been misappropriated.

A WELL AT POONA—ONE OF THE PLAGUE CENTRES OF INDIA.

At Andheri and Poona the people are no better off. Plague refugees have reached these places and victims multiply. Bombay seems to be a veritable centre of pestilence, from which waves of infection radiate widely throughout a very extensive section of India. Its streets are dotted at intervals with the blackened corpses of unburied victims, and there is hardly an effort to comply with the sanitary laws. It is noted as a remarkable instance of exemption that nearly up to the end of January not a single case of plague had occurred in the Christian orphanages of Bombay and Bandra.

Great anxiety is felt lest the plague should break out in Calcutta, and it is not believed that it can long escape. So insanitary and altogether wretched are the buildings and their surroundings that the government officials believe that the only way to purify the city, should plague come, would be to employ fire—the universal sanitary agent in Asiatic cities, where the pollution of generations lies in the soil.

Little news comes from the central districts where the famine is now raging, and where the plague has already set its grim hand on the feeble and emaciated population, sweeping them off by uncounted and applied to other purposes, so, through the misdeeds of heartless officials many millions of people are sacrificed. The Russian relief fund has not proved a success, and the relief movement in England makes slow progress. In this distressing condition of affairs the missionaries, in behalf of the starving and plague-stricken people, must look to Christian individuals and communities, rather than governments. As a means of aiding in this work of succor, and at the urgent request of many readers, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will undertake to forward to the missionaries stationed at the centres of famine and sickness in the interior, such contributions as may be sent to us for that purpose. All contributions will be acknowledged in these columns. The following have been received to date for the Indian Relief work:

THE MASSACRE ON THE NIGER.

Character and Appearance of the Warlike African Tribes Who Slaughtered the Peace Embassy at Benin—A Land of Treacherous Savages.

A KING OF THE GOLD COAST AND HIS COURT.

CAPTAIN BOISRAGON.

TO almost every country having distant colonial possessions in the midst of semi-savage tribes, there comes periodically an experience, sharp and painful, like that which England is undergoing at the present time, in consequence of the massacre of a British Peace Expedition by native tribesmen of the Gold Coast. That section of Africa has been called the "White Man's Grave," and in view of its deadly climate and the frequent treacheries of its native races, it has well deserves the appellation. For the account of this latest tragedy only British sources of information are yet available. It appears that for some time past the officials of the Niger Coast Protectorate have found trade seriously impeded by King Dvumah, of Benin, who would neither admit white traders to his territory nor allow his own subjects to traffic with Europeans. A British expedition started from the coast inland, on last New Year's Day for Benin City, to use their personal influence with the king. The party was headed by Acting Consul-General J. R. Phillips, Vice-Consul Major Crawford, Captain Boisragon, commander of the Protectorate forces, Captain Maling, two members of the Consular Staff, Messrs. Locke and Campbell, medical officer Elliott, and two young civilians, Messrs. Powis and Gordon. For escort they had a number of unarmed Kroomen and native carriers. They went up the Benin river in a yacht to Spacle, forty miles inland, and thence started by road for Benin City. On entering Benin territory the expedition was surprised and slaughtered. At one part of the journey the jungle was so thick that a number of Kroomen were sent ahead to clear the path. The whole party had been divided into three detachments for facility in traveling—a vanguard, a main body and a rear. On the main detachment coming up, they were surprised to find the bodies of the Kroomen all dead and horribly mutilated, lying scattered in the bush. When the rear of the expedition came up and all were gathered together, they were attacked by an overwhelming force of natives who had been in ambush and were almost instantly overpowered and cut down. Captain Boisragon and another member of the party (believed to be Mr. Locke) were the only persons who escaped the general massacre. They had taken the precaution to arm themselves secretly with pistols, and when attacked shot down several of the tribesmen and then escaped to the bush. After encountering many perils and almost dying of thirst, they managed to find their way back to a point of safety when they announced the news of the massacre.

Public feeling in England is greatly stirred up over this latest African tragedy, and steps are already being taken to administer severe punishment to the treacherous native monarch and his people. The troops of the Niger Coast Protectorate, 450 strong, with sixteen officers and an efficient artillery service, will probably be used in the punitive campaign now to open, and they will be supplemented by three small warships, the Phaëbe, Philomel and Alecto, while other vessels from the West African Squadron could be brought up speedily. As the district is intersected by streams, a naval contingent must play an important part in the expedition.

It is said that the natives of Benin regard their king as divine, and worship him accordingly. They believe that he neither eats nor sleeps, and in this ignorant notion they are supported by the native priests. The king is a fine-looking man, and on state occasions appears encased in coral, though the costume of his subjects is conspicuous by its absence. The territory of Benin is mostly swamp and dense forest. Bush paths are the only roads, and water is very scarce. Benin City itself, however, stands in a clearing. It is sixty miles from the coast, but the journey can be made by water to Gwato, within twenty-five miles distance, before entering the forest.

In a recent interview in the London Graphic, Mr. J. H. Swainson, a traveler who has visited Benin, gave an interesting description of "The City of Blood," by which designation it is known. Mr. Swainson said they sent word to the king that they were coming to visit his city. The king kept them outside his town for two days until his "fetish" was satisfied that the visit should be allowed. Twice he appointed a day to see the white men, and each time the arrangement was broken. Late one night a messenger arrived from the king asking Mr. Swainson to come to the king's house. Mr. Swainson went, and the king asked him all about Captain Gallwey, his companion, and asked whether he should see him. The king next day held a palaver with Captain Gallwey. The king wore a garment entirely covered with beads except the finger ends, the toes, nose, mouth, etc. He could not move, and as the flies frequently alighted on these extremities, a black servant stood by to knock them off and scratch the monarch. A treaty was signed between the king and Queen Victoria, and subsequently the king invited the two white men to witness a human sacrifice which he had just ordered to be made. This was declined, and Captain Gallwey very courageously told his majesty that, having made the treaty, he would have to stop these human sacrifices. Mr. Swainson thought that the interpreter did not tell the king Captain Gallwey's exact words, otherwise there might have been trouble. Nevertheless, the human sacrifices took place. Captain Gallwey and Mr. Swainson were allowed to walk through the town, and headless, some armless, or otherwise mutilated.

Our photographs, published on this page, were taken by Mr. F. W. Hughes, a correspondent, who not long ago visited Benin and the Gold Coast. They were taken from life and are specially interesting at the present time, in view of the recent massacre in that country, which will now in all likelihood be the scene of a war that will result in the obliteration of the heathen king and his court, and the annexation of Benin by the British.

THE CROSS.

Suggestions on the Epworth League Topic for Feb. 21, Isa. 53: 1-9.

IT is a strange thing that an instrument of humiliation, punishment and death should become a symbol of power and hope and eternal life. Howsoever the enemies of Christianity may argue and declaim they cannot deny the fact that to millions of men and women there is no symbol on earth to which they are so responsive as they are to the cross. There would be something repulsive in the symbol of the gallows, or the guillotine, but in the cross there are suggestions which make it inexpressibly dear. Yet it was not the means of ridding us of an enemy, or of avenging us of an injury, as the gallows might be; it was a means of torture to one whom we reverence and love. Why then is it a precious symbol? The passage associated with the topic explains the mystery. The pathetic story is told there in all its sadness and its glory. Thus Being, so dear to the Most High, growing up before him as a tender plant, full of the divine life which he is to impart to men, born to reveal God to the world, to be a clearer expression of him who had been speaking to the world in nature, in symbols and types, in the utterances of inspired prophets and poets, to show men what kind of life is possible in the human form, lays down his life on the cross. Just as the natives of an island saw at various points the bodies of human beings. One body was on a crucifix tree with arms and legs outstretched, another was that of a man who had been tied to a tree and starved to death, or account of there having been too much rain. Another had been similarly treated because the weather had been too hot, and at various parts of the city there were corpses, some

As we rejoice in our changed life here, and our hope of heaven beyond, we think of how the revelation of Our Father who is in heaven came to us, how patient and gentle, and pure, and compassionate, and sympathetic its Bearer was, and we ask ourselves what reward came to him for all he suffered in bearing our griefs and carrying our sorrows. Reward? The reward of being nailed to a cross to die under torture. Well, it was part of the undertaking. He knew it and he did not shrink from it. Beyond the agony and the wrenching assunder of soul and body, he saw down the vista of the centuries, thousands of the victims of sin escaping from their thralldom through his sacrifice, and he cheered himself as he said: "I, if I be lifted up will draw all men unto me." That divine magnetism is the hope of the world. From the sublime height of the Cross he extends a hand, and every man who grasps it is lifted up.

EL-AZHAR, COLLEGE OF FANATICS.

A Visit to the Greatest University in the World, at Cairo, Egypt, with 14,000 Moslem Students—Superstition as an Educational Element.

FOUR hundred mosques in Cairo, Egypt! That statement is substantially correct. Even the non-inquisitive tourist remarks that the Moslems have ample accommodations for religious services, and that the prayer-niches are conveniently situated. The most interesting of all the mosques is El-Azhar (the splendid or flowery), with its five minarets, one more than St. Sophia at Constantinople, where the Khatib (reader) dressed in a long red robe grasps a drawn sword as well as the Koran while reciting the prayer for the Sultan.

El-Azhar is famous as the seat of the great Mohammedan university, and is the centre for the study of Arabian literature. The instruction given in the Koran is gratuitous. There are now over 14,000 students in attendance which is the largest number ever reported. They come from Tunis, Turkey, and all Moslem lands. The only language spoken in the university is Arabic, and books written in other languages are prohibited. The large number of students may not indicate an intense desire for learning. If it be recollected that quite as much ado is made when a son enters the army as when he is buried, and as exemption of all members of the institution from military duty is ordered by law, the school may be safely reckoned as having thousands to whom the escaping from army life is the main inducement to study. There are two large courts paved with stone and connected by colonnade porches. The interior of the university building looks like a forest of columns, there being 400 of them, some of porphyry, some of marble, some of granite, said to have once stood in the porticoes of ancient Egyptian temples. This turning old structures into stone quarries is popular in the "Land of the Nile," for the Citadel is built of stones taken from the small pyramids of Gizeh. The students have no dormitories other than the open colonnades, where they sleep on the matting. They are not permitted to use coffee, at least in the bounds of the mosque; the cause for this restriction, however, I sections. The government had occasion to close up the Syrian quarter last year. The cholera having broken out among the students from Palestine, and one death having occurred, the Pasha of Cairo ordered that the sick ones be taken to a hospital and the mosque disinfected. In Cairo many of the natives think that the European doctors kill the patients in the hospitals, and hence they refuse to go. On this occasion the mosque entrances were barricaded and the doors closed and held by the Syrian contingent, refusing to permit any removals and the disinfecting. A body of police was sent, at the same time troops were ordered under arms, for a riot was expected. The Pasha was himself refused entrance, and was stoned by students. He then ordered his men to fire, and three college men fell dead, several others being wounded. The police forced the doors and the government sent the Syrian students home, closing their quarter for one year. If the educated Moslems thus behave, better can hardly be expected from the unlearned.

I met some of the expelled students on the Plain of Jezreel. They were very bitter against the English, whom they blame for the closing of them out of the university. El-Azhar is where the fanatic he said, "How many stars have you now?" I told him, "Have you got one for Venezuela yet?" he laughingly inquired. Some of the Moslems are well posted but they are the ones who receive more education than that obtained at El-Azhar.

There are no benches, chairs, or seats of any kind. The students sit on the floor, sometimes on mats or rugs, oftentimes on the stones, with their legs crossed under them; in little groups they sit, with the Koran open, committing to memory, which is the best developed faculty those Mohammedans have. They keep up a swaying to and fro, said by the less faithful to be done for the purpose of keeping awake. At some of the British universities, the student audience behaves as it wishes to, without hindrance, thus testing the ability of the speaker and accustoming him to speak with ease when the audience is not in sympathy. At El-Azhar the noise is emphatic and is helpful, committing the overt act. Ibrahim Pasha's beautiful equestrian statue in front of the Opera House du Cairo does not face toward Mecca, and the Mohammedan population, urged by the students, demanded that it be made to face the east or it would be demolished.

Upon the receipt of the news of the recent massacres in Armenia, they expressed satisfaction and were anxious to repeat them in Egypt, but when the English troops trained the great cannon of the citadel upon El-Azhar, they became calm. While the attendance in a score of years has increased from 6,000 to 14,000, the spirit and policy has modified more slowly. A powerful and dangerous institution is the great Mohammedan university of El-Azhar.

Ostriches in England.

Although the experiment of importing and breeding ostriches on American soil has not yet proved an unqualified success, a similar attempt in England has provoked some amusing if not satisfactory results. A wealthy lady, with the view of improving the scenery on her estate, has imported some birds from Bahia Blanca, in La Plata, South America. While on board ship their diet was a matter of great difficulty, corn having to be sown for them in the dark, so that they might consume the green shoots. Once on dry land, however, they regain their appetite, and live on potatoes, maize, and green food of all kinds. They consume a fair quantity of iron nails and such unconsidered trifles. The ostriches do not attain to maturity till they are three years old, and never acquire any remarkable amount of intelligence, though they have learned to answer to their names, and they exhibit a decided temper of their own. They stoutly resist any liberties in the way of harnessing, one method of defeating this object being to lie on their backs and kick. They jump a very fair height, and descend opening their wings like a parachute. Their antics and attitudes, in fact, are innumerable, and they have half-a-dozen ways of sitting down. They do not, however, hide their heads in the sand, or loose dirt, as some writers have asserted. The birds are excessively stupid in some things—for instance, in trying to get through small apertures. With the exception of a slight hiss, they are silent. It is thought that, as the ostriches get regularly acclimated in England, they may develop an extra thick crop of feathers to resist the cold, and might therefore become more valuable.

did not learn. Mohammed Ali, of Mameluke-destroying fame, cut off the large income of the university, and until a very recent date the professors have taught without remuneration, except what bakhshesh they received from private students, and especially from those striving to become teachers in the college. The university is divided according to countries. Each quarter or nationality has a sheik, and then there is the president, or chief sheik, who is over the heads of the ical leaders are trained to stir up strife, and argue the conversion of the Armenians or their annihilation. In the sixteenth century the study of mathematics was abandoned, for it was proven that everything necessary to know could be found in the Koran. A Pasha informed me that the study of elementary arithmetic has recently been introduced, and he says that the Moslems (he is of that persuasion) are so fanatical that progress can be made but slowly. This will be the entering wedge, the sciences will be taught later in El-Azhar. This same Pasha remarked, as we sat together on the deck of a steamer at anchor off the prison island of Rhodes, "the British government is liked by the lower classes in Egypt and hated by the upper classes. It is just the same in Cyprus. A prominent gentleman said: 'We have been used to the mercy of the Turkish government, and it is almost impossible to become accustomed to the justice of the English. They want everything just so, and it is so hard.' A vessel passed and I waved the United States flag. Then leading the student to develop unusual concentration of mind, much after the Chinese plan.

The students frequently argue some theological point, and if they do not agree, the proverbial way of putting a joke into a Scotchman's head is tried. Whether punching and pounding one another is a convincing sort or style of argument, I'm unable to remark, but their custom is after such a tussel to spit in each other's faces and continue the study of their Bible. The university is a co-educational institution, girls being admitted up to a certain age.

A few days before I arrived at the Esbekiyah Gardens, Cairo, a small number of English soldiers were bearing a comrade to his grave, when the students attacked the funeral procession and stoned the coffin and the men, being dispersed only after a body of national troops appeared on the scene. This was not an unusual occurrence, I was informed.

At the present time there are altogether 25,000 Moslem students in Cairo, and many of them are supported by scholarships (5), being incomes from willed property. The mortality among the students is greatest in winter, and is principally due to consumption. I was credibly informed that not only much of the unrest throughout Mohammedan lands is due to the students of El-Azhar, but that considerable of the fanatical demonstrations in the capital originate in the minds of the students, who inflame the populace to the point of

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City.

Entered at the Post Office at New York, as Second-class Matter

Mrs. Amelia E. Barr's splendid serial, "The King's Highway," which is now progressing in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has met with a most enthusiastic reception from our readers. For the convenience of new subscribers and those who subscribed after the story commenced, a Synopsis of the chapters that have already appeared will be published in next week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mercy for Convicts.

IN looking over the court news, I was struck with a remark that a prisoner made to a New York judge. The criminal having been several times arraigned, the judge kindly asked: "Why don't you reform?" and the answer came: "How can a man reform? No one will give him a recommendation if he has been imprisoned." Then I was impressed as never before that some better preparation ought to be made by society for the reception of our criminal population when they are turned loose. The societies that are attempting relief are well supported. Cannot our government do something to help such people up into right employment and back to respectable lives? Look over your prison reports and find how many men and women have been incarcerated two, three, four, ten times. Was it because their depravity kept them down? No, because there was no chance to get up. Who wants for clerk, or secretary, or servant, or day laborer, or accountant, or employee in any department, those on whom has been the shadow of a prison. These people are buffeted, and thrust back, and sneered at, and destroyed. They go back to their old crimes because it is a choice between that and starvation. Cannot factories or farms be opened where men who have been disgraced and astray may go and toil until they can get re-established in health, and have their empty purses partially replenished, and can make a new start so that they can get on independently and without the recommendation of others? Such an institution could be in Christian charity would soon pay for itself. But now all the avenues of work are closed against these moral unfortunates and they are beaten back into the vice from which they are ambitious to be rescued. We have much eloquent discussion about prison reform, and books and tracts of almost value on kindred themes, but how to help those who are recently liberated and who have all the embarrassments of that humiliating position upon them is a subject but little at-tated. The New York judge's question was not more kind than was the prisoner's answer tremendous: "How can a man reform if he have once been imprisoned?"

National Virtue.

AS long as God is so merciful to this country in providing luxuriant crops, it will require great genius of governmental mismanagement to throw the nation off the track. Let all commercial and mechanical, and agricultural, and literary interests pitch their tent toward the sunrise. Banking disasters half as great as those reported during the last few weeks would, in other days, have tossed everything beam ends. The tight times have put out of existence many fictitious commercial institutions, and the air is all the clearer for the thunderstorms. The future prosperity of this land is more certain than the uses we will make of our prosperity. If we could only be assured of the fact that the fortunes to be gathered would be consecrated to right uses it would add another trumpet tone to our anticipation. The fact that God has shown more kindness to this land than to any other country under the sun, puts this nation under more obligation to Christian behavior than any other. If the virtue of the people corresponded with the greatness of the Divine mercy shown them, this continent would soon be all garden, spiritual as well as aborescent.

Uncrowned Heroes.

IT is high time that we give more honor to the railroad engineers and firemen, and ship captains who perish for others. The newspapers are full of such sacrifices. No braver deeds were seen at Gettysburg or Austerlitz than are seen night by night amid the conflagrations of our great cities. We must have a new roll of martyrs. On the old roll were placed the names of the butchers of mankind and the destroyers of mankind. The more cities they had sacked, the more harvests they had trampled, the more batteries they had destroyed, the more battalions they had cut to pieces, the more blood they had shed, the higher up on the roll went their names; but on the new roll we will place those who nursed the sick, those who carried a lantern among the poor, those who planned asylums for the crippled and imbecile, those who bound up the wounds of the world, and I hope on this new roll shall be placed the names of the firemen who, amid darkness and storm and crackling flame and tumbling wall, fought for the safety of our cities. Amid the loudest cheers ever uttered ring out the cheers for the brave firemen!

Half-Starved Students.

MANY of our best young men in preparation for the ministry are going through a semi-martyrdom. The strongest mind in the theological class to which I belonged perished, the doctors said afterward, from lack of food. The only time he could afford a doctor was for his post-mortem examination. I give the financial condition of many of our young theological students:

Income	$250
Board at $1 per week (cheap place)	156
Clothing (shoddy)	100
Books (no Morocco)	25
Traveling expenses	20
Total	$301

Here you see a deficit of fifty-one dollars. As there are no stealings in a theological seminary he makes up the balance by selling books or teaching school. He comes into life, cowed down, with a patch on both knees and several other patches, and a hat that has been "done over" four or five times, and so weak that the first sharp wind that whistles around the corner blows him into glory. The inertness you complain of in the ministry starts early. Do you suppose that if Paul had spent seven years in a cheap boarding-house, and the years after in a poorly-supplied parsonage, he would have made Felix tremble? No! the first glance of the Roman Procurator would have made him apologize for intrusion. Do not think that all your six-hundred-dollar-minister needs is a Christmas present of an elegantly bound copy of "Calvin's Institutes?" It is a poor consolation if in this way you remind him that he has been fore-ordained to starve to death. Keep your minister on artichokes and purslain, and he will be fit to preach nothing but funeral services from the text, "All flesh is grass." I would like to thunder it so loud that it would be heard from here clear across the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra Nevadas, "Let churches do better by their pastors and their pastors will do better by their churches."

For the Gospel ministers of America and those preparing for the ministry, I bespeak more generous consideration. They are, with few exceptions, grand and noble and glorious men. Upon them I invoke the richest temporal and spiritual blessings of that God who commissioned them to go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature.

Important Notices.

Some Premium Offers Withdrawn

IN order that we may reserve a sufficient number of these Premiums to meet the requirements of Renewing Subscribers, we find ourselves compelled, as far as New Subscribers are concerned, to withdraw the following three Premium propositions:

- 1st. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year and the plain red under gold edged Bible at $2.
- 2d. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year and Margaret E. Sangster's "Home Life Made Beautiful" at $2.
- 3rd. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year and Marion Harland's "Home of the Bible," at $2.

These propositions are still available for present CHRISTIAN HERALD Subscribers renewing in course of the year, but we cannot fill orders from new Subscribers for any of these Premiums.

Premium Propositions Still Open.

Until further notice the following offers are open to both old and new Subscribers:

- 1st. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Library for 1897—ten beautiful and exceedingly useful volumes aggregating 3,200 pages, in a very handsome bookcase—and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, for $3.
- 2d. The International Self-Pronouncing Teacher's Bible with red under gold edges, and thumb-indexed, silk-sewed and leather-lined, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, at $3; and, of course,
- 3rd. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD without any Premium for one year at $1.50.

How to Get Premiums Free.

We are frequently in receipt of communications from persons who desire to obtain our Premiums, but who cannot afford to pay for them, yet who would be willing to work up new subscribers in payment if such a proposition would commend itself to us.

Heretofore we have not thought well of entertaining such propositions, but to give the matter a fair test we will, during the month of February—and only during the month of February—permit such of our friends as desire to secure either the 1897 Library or a thumb-indexed Bible, to send us three annual subscriptions, Premium or non-Premium, and in return therefor, we will present them free with their choice of an 1897 Library, ten volumes aggregating 3,200 pages and handsome book-case, or a Thumb-Indexed, Leather-lined, silk-sewed, Self-Pronouncing Teacher's Bible, with red under gold edges.

Three to One.

Please bear in mind that it takes three subscribers, with or without Premium, to earn either one of the two Premiums mentioned, and that the offer will hold good only during the month of February.

It is almost needless to add that no commissions can be allowed under this or any other Premium offer.

We beg especially to direct the attention of all our friends who contemplate availing themselves of this opportunity to the fact that we cannot supply the plain-edged Bible, or "Home of the Bible," or "Home Life Made Beautiful," as has already been set forth in an announcement at the beginning of this article.

BRIEF NOTES.

Dr. G. Whitfield Guinness, the younger son of Dr. H. Grattan Guinness, is leaving for China this month as a medical missionary of the China Inland Mission.

Rev. Frank S. Scudder, of Mount Vernon, N. Y., has resigned his pastorate in the Reformed Church to go out to Japan as a missionary. He expects to labor in Tokio.

Policeman Philip Rogers, of one of New York's patrol boats, has the proud distinction of having saved from drowning during the twenty-four years he has been on the police force seventeen men, women and children.

Rev. S. T. McKim, of Grundy Centre, Iowa, writes to a contemporary that the churches of the neighborhood have been deeply stirred by a series of Bible readings given by Evangelist H. W. Brown, who spent three weeks there in valuable labor.

Rev. R. G. Pearson's evangelistic meetings at Memphis, Tenn., have been fruitful in conversions. Fifteen churches of various denominations have received additions to their membership, of persons who came to a decision at Mr. Pearson's meetings.

At the close of an eloquent appeal for the poverty-stricken people of Ireland, one of the orator's hearers declined to respond on the ground that a brewing company in that country distributed in one year profits to the amount of three and a-half million dollars.

Mrs. Ballington Booth has now six hundred members in her Prison League, all of them convicts or ex-convicts except herself. She says that of the eighty-six prisoners in Sing Sing prison who professed conversion at her first visits to the prison not one has wavered or relapsed.

The extent of poverty in New York is shown by the fact that when it was known that any homeless person might sleep on the benches of the auditorium in the headquarters of the Salvation Army, fifteen hundred men availed themselves of the privilege nightly. In Chicago a similar offer had like results.

Roman Catholic journals report that instructions from Rome have been received in Mexico peremptorily ordering that the church give a loyal support to the government of President Diaz. This will be of great service to the president, as hitherto the Romish priests have been his implacable and determined opponents.

Evangelist Grant C. Tullar begins a series of meetings on Feb. 14 at the Westminster Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. Mr. Tullar has been co-operating with Major Hilton at Aledo, Ill. He expresses the strong hope that in spite of the difficult circumstances, the work done there will be found to have borne much fruit for Christ.

Consul Mrs. Booth-Tucker of the Salvation Army will conduct a special series of talks on Bible studies at Hardman Hall, Fifth avenue and Ninth street, beginning Friday, February 12, and continuing on Fridays for a month. Cards of invitation may be had on application to Consul Booth-Tucker, 122 West 14th Street, New York.

A testimony to the progress of this country in the spirit of compassion for the unfortunate and the erring as it was exemplified in the teaching of Christ is given by John Bach McMaster, who, in an article in the Atlantic Monthly, calls attention to the fact that at the beginning of this century, "in all our land there was not a reformatory, nor an asylum for the blind, for the deaf and dumb, nor for lunatics."

Jerry McAuley's Cremorne Mission has the happiness of beginning its new year of work with a balance of nearly a thousand dollars in hand. The debt of $1,800 with which it closed its year's labors was completely wiped out by its liberal friends, and a surplus was provided toward the cost of this year's work. The annual expenses are about five thousand dollars. The mission is now conducted by Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Ballou.

A Presbyterian Missionary in Japan, writing to the American Bible Society, says that a student in the naval college there, being deluged by the rules of the college from Bible reading, all book except text books being forbidden to the student, goes to the rooms of a Christian professor every Sunday to hear the Bible read. He generally carries away with him for private study one or two verses written on slips of paper.

Miss Emma C. Nason, whose work among the lumbermen has been so remarkably blessed, has recovered from the severe sickness which kept her a prisoner during the closing weeks of last year. She has resumed her work with her old energy. During her sickness the missionaries, bearing the there would be a deficiency of funds, spontaneously offered to work on half-pay for two months rather than have any part of the field abandoned.

The Evangelical Alliance for the United States referring to the Treaty of Arbitration between this country and Great Britain, prior to the addition of the Senate's amendments, resolved that: "Having giving faithful consideration to the terms of the treaty, we believe that its several provisions are honorable and safe. In our judgment the treaty, if ratified, will conserve the highest interests of the two countries immediately concerned, and will tend to promote the best interests of the world."

The effort to secure a union of all Methodist bodies in Australasia appears, says the Independent, about to be crowned with success. For bodies are concerned the Wesleyan and Primitive Methodists, the United Methodist Free Churches and the Bible Christians. The matter has been the subject of a comprehensive referendum, including in some cases adherents as well as members and in all cases trustees and official members. Quarterly meetings. With incomplete returns, appears that of 41,000 members attending meetings called to decide the matter, 30,000 voted in favor of union and only 6,500 against it.

The services in Carnegie Music Hall, New York, will be continued through this month. Mr. Moody had two immense audiences on January 1. Mr. Sankey led the musical exercises for the last time for several months, as he was starting for the following day. In March Mr. Moody will commence his labors in Connecticut. Meetings in Boston increase in interest from week to week. In response to Mr. Moody's inquiry living converts of his meetings in Boston, in 1896, over nineteen hundred persons sent him their names and addresses. This, as Mr. Moody says, is practical evidence that the real converts stick.

THE BIBLE

AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE COMING CABINET.

ONE of the most momentous duties a President-elect has to perform between the time of his election and his inauguration is the selection of statesmen to form his Cabinet. Under our system government these statesmen have to be something more than mere chiefs of bureaus. While each is responsible respectively for the conduct of affairs in his own department, his opinion is sought on matters of general policy and his counsel expected in difficulties that may arise in other departments. The Cabinet is, therefore, practically an advisory council for the President, and should be composed of statesmen who are in accord on questions of general policy and have an enlightened view of national affairs. President-Elect McKinley is taking time to make his selections, but he has already filled several places and among them the two most important in the Cabinet, those of Secretary of State and Secretary of the Treasury. On this page are portraits of the two statesmen who have accepted these responsible offices. Senator John Sherman who will, as Secretary of State, have charge of our foreign relations, is nearly seventy-four years old and has been prominent in national affairs for more than forty years. He became a member of the House of Representatives in 1854 and served there continuously until 1860, when he was elected to the Senate. He has been a member of that chamber ever since, excepting the four years of President Hayes's Administration, in which he held the office of Secretary of the Treasury. Though Mr. Sherman has won his reputation chiefly in financial affairs, he will not enter the State Department as a novice. Since his return to the Senate in 1881, at the close of the Hayes administration, he has been a member, and, for the greater part of the time, Chairman, of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. He has in this capacity had cognizance of every treaty negotiated by the government during the last sixteen years, and has had to weigh and discuss each of them in committee and in the Senate chamber. This experience will be of immense value to him in his new office, in which a close and intimate knowledge of diplomacy is an essential qualification. Mr. Lyman J. Gage, who will have the management of our financial affairs, also brings to the cabinet the skill of a trained expert. Although he has not had the legislative experience of Mr. Sherman, he has had a long commercial training, and is intimately acquainted with financial affairs. He is now sixty-one years old, and for nearly forty years has been in the banking business. He is a native of New York State, but went to Chicago in 1855. He rose from the position of clerk and night watchman in a lumber yard to be President of the First National Bank and President of the Bankers' National Association. Mr. Gage is said to be in no way a politician and as an evidence of his freedom from party ties it is said that in 1884 he temporarily deserted his party and cast his vote in the Presidential election for Mr. Cleveland. When it was known that he was President-elect was considering his name for the Treasury a flood of endorsements from influential men in all sections poured in, heartily recommending Mr. Gage as a man eminently fitted for the position. Thus the first and second places in the Cabinet are filled, and for the sake of the country we may well pray that they and all the other counsellors the President-elect will call around him may prove to be like the men who went to David in Hebron:

Men who had understanding of the times to know what Israel ought to do. (1. Chron. 12: 32.)

A Carnivorous Plant.

A botanical journal publishes a graphic description of a plant found in North Carolina which seems to occupy a place near the boundary of the animal kingdom. It is scientifically classified as dionaea muscipula, but is colloquially known as "Venus' fly trap." In appearance the extraordinary plant is a leafless flower stem, running from six to eight inches in height and surmounted by a cluster of five petalled blossoms, rising erect like a rosette. The modest little plant, which is so delicate that it dies of the slightest injury to root or stem, sustains its life by feeding upon the unwary insects that chance to alight upon its leaves to sip the honey-like fluid with which they are coated. In the heart of this blossom are two soft, velvety leaves, fringed with delicate bristles and hinged together on one side. The unsuspecting fly, lured by the honey, alights on these bristles in anticipation of a feast, but at the first touch of its feet the hinges close, the two leaves come together, the bristles interlock, and the hapless insect is imprisoned in a cell from which escape is impossible. Under the stimulus of the victim's struggles the tiny glands with which the inner walls of the trap are furnished pour forth a vegetable gastric juice resembling that which effects digestion in animal life. Under the influence of this fluid, the fly is actually digested alive, and its juices being extracted the trap doors are re-opened and the skeleton is flung out. The plant doubtless never lacks this form of sustenance. The insect world has no means of discovering the danger that lurks behind the honey until it is too late. Even men whom it is possible to warn, are often caught in a similar way through their love for the pleasures with which deadly traps are baited. In his sorrow and shame the young man often recalls the tones of entreaty and warning in which parents, friends, and God's Word told him of his danger.

And thou mourn at the last when thy flesh and thy body are consumed. (Prov. 5: 11.)

Warned by Rats.

A press dispatch from Shamokin, Pa., says that a few days ago all the men in the Girard Colliery, left the mine and came to the surface in haste. They said they believed the mine was settling, and that it was unsafe to remain longer. Asked their reasons for the opinion, they said that they had seen all the rats which infest that part of the mine in which they work, scamper away to another part of the workings. The miners regarded the movement as a sure portent of disaster, and they had promptly left their work. An examination of the chambers was made at once and it was found that the pillars supporting the roof of the mine were bulging, indicating the approach of the dreaded "squeeze." The superintendent went down with a gang of workmen and shored up the weak places.

Several sharp cracks were heard while the work was in progress, but the pillars have ceased to bulge, and it is hoped that the danger of a collapse has been averted. When danger to life is involved, men will act on the warning of a creature as insignificant as a rat, but when eternal life is at stake they are often deaf to the pleadings of the wisest and most eloquent of men.

Thou art unto them as a lovely song of one that hath a pleasant voice and can play well on an instrument: for they hear thy words, but they do them not. (Ezek. 33: 32.)

Wrecked on a Reef.

A press dispatch from Gloucester, Mass., tells a thrilling story of a recent wreck on the Nova Scotian coast. During a thick snow storm the schooner Yosemite was running with reefed sails. Her captain believed that he was well out from shore, but now thinks that his compass must have been defective. Suddenly with a fearful shock the schooner struck on a reef which runs out from Ram's Island. There were ten men in the crew, and all but one, who was in the rigging, were on deck when the vessel struck. The man in the rigging was never seen again, but the other nine succeeded in scrambling on the rock. It was a perilous situation, for the waves washed over it at intervals and seemed to hunger for their lives. They secured pieces of timber from the wreck, and by setting them in crevices of the rock made rough shelters, behind which they passed the night. When the sun rose it was found that one man who had been hurt when the vessel struck had died in know that Christ gave his life to provide a way of salvation, yet do not avail themselves of it!

How shall we escape if we neglect, so great salvation? (Heb. 2: 3.)

Elevated Railroad Disaster.

A disaster which the public believed might some day take place, but which the experts of elevated railroad travel declared was impossible, occurred in Brooklyn, N. Y., on January 28. An engine and the first car of a passenger train descended bodily from the structure to the street below. It was soon after seven o'clock in the evening, when the elevated railroads are carrying large numbers of workmen from their daily labor in New York to their homes in the suburbs of Brooklyn. Happily, the train, heavily laden at the start, had been almost emptied of passengers at intermediate stations before it reached Van Sicklen avenue. About a hundred persons, however, had a little farther to go, and the train steamed along at its usual rate. There are three tracks in that neighborhood, the middle track being used after the "rush hours" to store the cars for the night. A switch which ought to be closed after using, connects both outside tracks with the inner track and permits the trains to pass easily from one track to either of the others. An empty train entered the switch just before the train from the Bridge arrived, but instead of going on the middle track, it went right ahead to the uptown track and struck the engine of the moving train on its side. For an instant the engine swayed under the blow and then rolled over and fell bottom upward in the street. The smoker, which was attached to it, followed, and rested with its forward end on the prostrate engine and its rear end against the elevated structure. The fall broke the coupling between the smoker and the three cars in the rear. They remained on the track, but the sudden stop broke the windows and severely shook the passengers. The engineer of the moving train was killed, and his fireman was so badly injured that an amputation of one of his legs was necessary. The engineer and fireman of the empty train were also hurt, and the passengers in the smoker, who were thrown heavily to the forward end of the car, were badly cut and bruised and had to be sent to the hospital. In trying to determine the responsibility for the accident, the inquiry will properly be directed to the duty connected with the switch. If the switch had been closed as it should have been, the accident would not have occurred. If it is proved that some man left it open who should have closed it, he will be held responsible, although he had no evil intent. It is in this as it is in the moral and spiritual world; the man who neglects a duty can never tell how many people may have to suffer through his negligence.

For none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself. (Rom. 14: 7.)

An Involuntary Voyage.

A reminiscence of an adventurous voyage was given recently to a reporter by an old sailor now living on a farm on Long Island. He was one of the crew of a whaler, and was ashore for a day's holiday, when news reached him that a school of nine whales had been sighted. He hurried on board and joined in the pursuit. The crews of three boats took part in the chase and each succeeded in harpooning a whale. Then followed an exciting and dangerous voyage. The whales made a desperate struggle to escape. They dragged the boats fully ten miles out to sea before they gave up the contest. Two of the boats narrowly escaped destruction. Happily all the boats returned safely with their prizes which subsequently realized a large sum. This did not always happen, the old sailor says. Sometimes even after a whale had been harpooned, the captain had to cut the rope and abandon the prize to avoid being dragged under. It is so with other prizes. Sometimes in business pursuits a man who has almost secured some coveted prize, finds himself dragged out into dangerous currents, where he must either relinquish his prize or go down into the world's vortex and lose his soul. It is not always that the pursuer has the wisdom to decide on the safe course and relinquish his pursuit.

They that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare and into many foolish and hurtful lusts which drown men in destruction and perdition. (1 Timothy 6: 9.)

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

PRaise YE THE LORD

FIRST CHRISTIAN MARTYR.

Sunday School Lesson for Feb. 21.
Acts 6: 8-15; 7: 54-60. Golden Text,
Rev. 2: 10. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WHILE the Jewish authorities were consuming their sin of resisting the Holy Ghost, the enemy was busy within the church. It is with an anguish of heart which the present state of the Christian church causes, that we go back to her point of departure from her first love. Christ "died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves but unto him which died for them and rose again." (11. Cor. 5: 5) And yet, among the very company, none of whose members in its beginning would say of aught of the things which he possessed that it was his own, there arose now a murmuring about the distribution of alms. Already the church of Christ had ceased to be "of one heart and of one soul," and the distinction between those who overcome and those who do not overcome, so strongly taught in Rev. 2: 3, began to be manifested. It is just in such circumstances that truly saintly souls and real martyrs are found. "There must be also heresies among you that they which are approved (who have stood the test) may be manifest among you." (1. Cor. 11: 19.)

The First Deacons.

In all things evil God overrules for his glory. The very murmuring of the disciples led to the choosing of capable men among them who should superintend the distribution of alms; and seven men "of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom" were chosen from among them for this business of the church, that the apostles might be set free to wait upon God, and to minister the word unto the people. One of the seven was Stephen, who, in addition to the execution of business, because he was "full of faith and power, did great wonders and miracles among the people." This aroused the enmity of those who, for a time had been quieted through the intervention of Gamaliel. A conscience which is regulated by feelings and impressions may be awakened and active for a time, under such an appeal as that of Gamaliel, but it is only a conscience which is habitually controlled and regulated by the Holy Ghost which continues to take God's side of things. Man's jealousy of man is a stronger power in the natural heart than his fear of God. Persecution broke out; it could not be otherwise; the power of God dwelling in the disciples was such that it was felt everywhere. The externalism of the Pharisee, the rationalism of the Sadducee, the representative doctrines of the Herodians, the Libertines, and those of the sects from abroad stood no chance against it. They came and "disputed with Stephen" but in vain. God was in him; and they were not able to resist the wisdom and the Spirit by which he spoke. "Why should a man fear whom God the Holy Ghost dwells? He has the promise: 'It shall be given you in that same hour what ye shall say, and what ye shall speak, for it is not ye that speak but the Holy Ghost' (Matt. 10: 20). Stephen experienced this. How foolish is self defence in a child of God! The power which disabled the enemies of the Lord Jesus, so that 'he put the Sadducees to silence' that 'no man was able to answer him a word' nor durst ask him any more questions (Matt. 22: 34-36), dwells in them. Oh, for an answering, practical belief in the presence and power of the Holy Ghost!

Unable to resist him as they had been unable to resist his Lord, they resorted to the same expedient to get rid of him; they apprehended him on a false plea of blasphemy, and set up false witnesses which perverted his words as those of his Master had been perverted before him. Now the disciple should drink of the cup which he had drunk and should be baptized with his baptism. But took place: "All that sat in the council looking steadfastly on him saw his face as it had been the face of an angel." Were they reminded of the blinding light which Moses' face reflected from his forty days alone with God on Mount Sinai, and did a sword pierce some hearts with the reflection that such a face was not an index of blasphemy in the heart but was a certain sign that God's presence was there? Interrogated by the high priest, this yielded instrument of the Holy Ghost addressed the assembly. Not a word did he say in his own defence, to "endure grief, suffering wrongfully" belongs to the true spirit of Christ. Stephen's object was to show how matters stood between them and God, putting himself completely out of the and rebelled again and again against him, because the Spirit of God was with him. He alludes to their history since Moses' time in the words, "Which of the prophets did not your fathers persecute? And they killed them which shewed before of the coming of the Righteous One: of whom ye have now become betrayers and murderers: ye who received the law as it was ordained by angels, and kept it not." (Acts 7: 51-53, R.V.) It was a long, shameful history of resisting God, and now in the person of the disciples where he was dwelling, as he could not dwell in temples made with hands, the same people were manifesting the same spirit. Would they crown their rejection of the Lord Jesus by finally rejecting the Holy Ghost?

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

THE story of Stephen is brief, but it is full of valuable lessons. We first hear of him as one of the seven men appointed to attend to the daily distribution to the poor. It was a humble duty for a man of his character and abilities, but it was service, and with the spirit of Christ he accepted it. A man who was anxious to "push to the front" might have despised such work, but in no place could he have gained a glory equal to that he has, as the first of the long line of martyrs who laid down their lives in their Master's cause. The names of the seven seem to indicate that they all belonged to the party of Grecian or Hellenistic Jewish Christians, who had complained of the partiality of the Apostles. They were Jews born in foreign lands, who spoke Greek, while those born in Palestine spoke Aramaic, a modified form of the ancient Hebrew.

"LOOKED UP STEADFASTLY INTO HEAVEN AND SAW THE GLORY OF GOD."

question. His first word was, "The God of glory." God filled his heart, not the care for his own life. Tracing the history of God's dealings with Israel from the very call of Abraham, he showed how, already in their persecution of Joseph, their fathers had taken part against God, and had sold into Egypt their brother through whom God would deliver their posterity. God was with him but they were against him; and Joseph finally delivered those that hated him.

Then he showed them how, in later things, Moses also, who was "fair to God" was rejected and misunderstood by his brethren. "This Moses whom they refused saying, Who made thee a ruler and a judge? him hath God sent to be both a ruler and a deliverer with the hand of the angel which appeared to him in the bush." After showing how, with wonders and signs Moses delivered them, Stephen again speaks to them of "the angel which spake to him in Mount Sinai." (Acts 7: 38, R.V.) Who is this angel? He was sent before them to keep them in the way, and to bring them into the place prepared. They were warned, "Take ye heed of him, and hearken unto his voice, provoke him not, for he will not pardon your transgression, for my name is in him." (Is. 23: 20-23, R.V.) Isaiah calls him "the angel of His presence," and further, "His Holy Spirit," and he bears witness that "they grieved" him. (Isa. 43: 9-11.) No wonder, then, Stephen sums up his appeal to his people thus: "Ye still necked and uncircumcized in heart and ears, ye do always resist the Holy Ghost: as your fathers did, so do ye."

This was the culminating sin of the Jewish people at this time. They could not, in the family of Jacob, tolerate their brother Joseph, because God was with him, they refused in like manner, Moses,

Further evidence that Stephen belonged to the Grecian party is furnished by the fact that the quotations from the Bible in his speech, are all from the Greek version of the Old Testament. His opponents were of foreign birth, too. In some instances their nationality is mentioned. The Libertines were Jews who had been taken prisoners and afterwards set free. They were evidently zealous for the religion of their fathers and the maintenance of the existing order. In our day we should call them conservative—men opposed to innovation and any new light. They would naturally be indignant if Stephen spoke, as Christ did, of the temple and the Mosaic institutions, as being superseded. They tried to silence Stephen by argument, and when that failed they proceeded to persecution. Their zeal may have been well-meant at first, but zealous men are liable to be betrayed into evil methods, if they get the idea that they are justified in doing evil that good may come. They succeeded in making Stephen unpopular, and incited the people against him. A plot with hired testimony was concocted, and at last Stephen was arrested and arraigned before the grand council, on a charge of blasphemy, which was a capital offence. The plan, however, appears to have been to avoid condemning him to death. The necessity of getting the Roman endorsement of the sentence, which had proved so difficult in Christ's case, led them to seek a different method. Pilate was deposed and there would be a delay in securing a regular execution; but there would be little danger of an inquiry into a lynching. Stephen's speech at his trial was not a defence of himself, but an indictment of his judges. In a brief rapid style he reviewed the national history, to show how often the people had been wrong. He was put on trial for speaking against Moses and his system, which was as culpable in Jew's opinion as if he had spoken against God, yet how had the nation treated Moses? Stephen was charged with conspiracy against the temple, but Isaiah had shown that the temple could not fulfil its object. He had proceeded so far when he seems to have been interrupted or to have seen some sign of the futility of speaking further. In the fifty-first verse he abruptly stops his historical survey and launches into denunciation, closing with description of a vision there granted him. There was probably some sign given, but not mentioned, and the confusion breaks up in confusion, and Stephen hurried out by the mob and carried to the stoning-place. There, according to the usual practice, he would be urged to pray to God for pardon. Then the two witnesses, which the law required in capital cases, would each hurl a stone at him; he knelt, and afterward the whole crowd would join in dashing the life out of the victim. Like his Lord, he died with prayer for his murderers on his lips. The presence of Paul, is incidentally mentioned at the close, as having, by his being there given countenance to the proceedings, was probably he who gave Luke the vivid description of the trial, which he incorporated in his history in the Acts. The long speech of Stephen reads like the report of some eye-witness quoting from memory. There are several historic blunders in it, as when he speaks (Ver. 1) of seventy-five souls going into Egypt instead of sixty-six and (Ver. 16), of Abraham buying the burial-place at Syche when it was Jacob who bought it. These and other mistakes might easily have been the mistakes of the report not of Stephen.

I see the heavens opened. Stephen was standing on the elevation from which he can see visions which are not granted ordinary men—the elevation of suffering for Christ's sake. Heaven is nearer to than we think and the veil which hides from our visions is sometimes withdrawn in a supreme crisis in order, as in the case of Elisha's servant (11. Kings 6: 17) that we may gain the strength needed. This is a story of a chief who in a desperate battle received severe wounds and fell to the ground. The enemy seeing him and believing him to be killed raised exultant shout and his own men stricken with dismay fell back. The chief raised himself on his elbow and calling to retreating followers, said: "My children, I am not dead. I am looking to see if you do your duty." At the sound of his voice they rallied, and while he watched they returned to the charge with a victory that drove the foe from the field.

Looked up steadfastly. A great preacher gives a forcible illustration from a mountain experience. He was on top of a mountain from which he could see several towns and a large city. Smoke was coming from the chimneys, and the preacher thought of the work that was going on and the busy life of the streets. His heart ached as he thought of the sins of the cities and he wondered what the outcome would be. He closed his eyes and cried to God. When he opened his eyes again a change had come over the landscape. Between him and the plain there had rolled light clouds cutting off his view. Above him, stretched the clear blue sky and seemed the only living creature in sight. He was alone with God and felt quite satisfied.

Lord Jesus, receive my spirit. The biographer of Dr. Livingstone gives a touching description of the finding of his body. The hut was almost dark. The bed had not been disturbed. Beside it knelt a great explorer, his body stretched forward, his head buried in his hands upon the floor. They would not disturb him, at Majwara said that he had not moved for hours. Then Matthew advanced slowly and reverently touched Livingstone's cheek. It was cold. He must have been dead for hours. Dead as he prayed.

He fell asleep. It is a strange expression to use about a man whose body was crushed under huge stones. Yet, how the Christian dies, his death is like falling asleep. "A miracle! A miracle!" cried James Bainham, one of the men who the priests burned in the reign of Henry VIII. His body was fastened to the stake and the flames were licking it with fiery tongues. None expected to hear his voice again; but from the midst of the fire came the cry, "A miracle! I feel no pain. In this burning I am not suffering. I die as on a bed of down."

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE.

IN PERSIAN HOMES.

Simple Life in the Towns and Villages of the Shah's Empire—The Household "Koorsee" and its Uses.

This season, when winter's icy blasts are chilling the homes of the poor throughout our own land, and the supreme object in life, in many places, seems to be to keep warm, the scene in the photograph on this page cannot fail to excite sympathetic interest. It represents a Persian family group of the poorer class, huddled around the "Koorsee" or household heater, in the common sleeping-room. They are presumably settled for the night, the children being pillowed on blankets on the floor with their feet toward the heat, while the older members of the family make themselves as comfortable as possible in the outer circle.

The "Koorsee" is a low, broad, round, under which is a basin with a charcoal fire, a large quilt or double blanket being thrown over the whole to keep the warmth. In cold weather, the family and any strangers who may happen to be their guests, assemble around the "Koorsee" and draw the cover over themselves up to the chin. The floor of such a house is that shown in our illustration—usually an earthen one, over which a straw mat is placed and then a few rugs over all, thus forming a bed not by any means uncomfortable, though, to European or American eyes, it would not seem at all inviting for a night's repose. When bed-time arrives, all the bedclothes—which, during the day have been rolled up and set against the wall for use as seats—are spread down on the floor, except in the homes of the wealthy, the sleeping apartment is used by non-Moslem families in common, half a dozen or even more persons reposing in the same chamber. Wool, cotton or feather mattresses and pillows, and linen sheets, constitute the sleeping equipment.

In Mohammedan homes, however, there is greater privacy and no one is admitted to the family sleeping-room, except the mother, father, and children. Usually the rooms are lighted by oil-lamps, though here are very many homes in Persia where the tallow candle is still the only lumina-tor. Some old-fashioned houses in the villages use little earthen vessels filled with oil, in which floats a cotton wick. This is set upon a candle-stick and sheds a faint light throughout the dingy room.

Persian houses, for the most part, are substantial, gloomy-looking stone structures, with strong wooden doors. The homes of the rich are furnished in the most sumptuous style of Oriental magnificence. In the hot Persian summer, fire is only needed on chilly days, and the families sleep on the flat roofs. Meals are eaten three times daily. Among the very poor, dinner may consist of a mess of vegetable soup and some pila, or possibly only a piece of bread, a morsel of cheese and a draught of butter-milk. The rich have tables that would tempt the most capricious appetite, and which cost a fortune to support.

Little Maids of the Zuyder Zee.

Quaint little prim figures are those of the children of Marken on the Zuyder Zee, Holland. The dress of mothers and daughters—even the girl babies—is essentially alike. Short skirts reaching nearly to the ankles, and very full below the waist; large full aprons with wide bands across the back; dark woollen stockings and stout wooden shoes; sleeveless colored bodices that have sometimes done service in two or maybe three generations; arms covered with sleeves of red-and-white striped cloth, and on the head a close-fitting cap, covering the ears, and trimmed with lace ribbons and embroidery, such is the national dress which one sees everywhere. Even the little girls, except for their fresh, young faces and diminutive stature, look just like their mothers, their bulky dresses and queer Dutch "kindercaps" giving them the appearance of little women.

Is She the Oldest Woman?

In the old town of San Antonio, Tex., lives a little, aged Mexican woman, Marie la Candelaria Castenon de Villanueva by name, who is reported to be the oldest woman on this continent. She is said to keeping the kitchen wood box filled, carrying a stick at a time. I know a child a year and a-half old that can put all the knives and forks around the table, taking them out of the basket that is put on a chair for him. Children that develop the industrious sense early will always like to work. I don't mean to make a drudge of the child, but let him feel that he is actually doing something that counts for the welfare of the family. I can assure you that it is far easier to follow the first impulse, but when we realize that in doing so we are adding weakness instead of strength to our child's character, our choice will not be hard. Of course there are times when a mother's loving solace is needed, and no mother need be told how to discern them. If we used the time spent in unnecessarily "babying" our children for joyous play, a good story, or preparing some little surprise for them, how much we could add to their real growth and happiness."

The "Curfew" Idea.

Whether or not the "Curfew" idea now so widely discussed, shall again prevail, even in a few localities, it is quite certain that our modern society cannot be harmed by having the subject up for consideration. In our great cities, and even in less thickly populated quarters, the tendency to turn night into day is steadily increasing, and the old-fashioned, sober habit, (so condu-

GOOD-NIGHT, LITTLE DARLING.

GOOD-NIGHT, little darling, good-night. I suppose it's a blessing—the Master knows best—
Why my dear should go home from the world of unrest,
From the papa of earth to the Great Father's breast;
So good-night, little dear, good-night.
Good-night, little darling, good-night. Too early it seems for my baby to sleep,
But I pass my sweet one to Jesus to keep;
And I miss you so, precious, I cannot but weep;
But good-night, little dear, good-night.
Good-night, little darling, good-night. I know you will gently and peacefully rest
With your head pillowed on the dear Lord's gentle breast,
The most placid, sweetest, that ever it pressed;
So good-night, little dear, good-night.
Good-night, little darling, good-night. I will see you again at the breaking of day,
When the great Sun shall rise and the dark flee away,
But till that time, my precious, your papa must stay;
So good-night, my dear, good-night.

The Mothers' Congress Programme

As the approaching National Congress of Mothers, which meets in Washington, D.C., Feb. 17-19, is attracting widespread attention throughout the country, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD takes pleasure in presenting the official programme of the Congress which it has just received through the courtesy of the Press Manager, Mrs. Henry J. Finley.

THURSDAY MORNING.

1. Devotional: Mrs. Maud Ballington Booth. 2. Dietetics: Mrs. Louise M. Hogan, Germantown, Pa. 3. Mother's Relation to the Sound Physical Development of her Child: Mrs. Annie Jenness Miller. 4. Reproduction and Natural Law: Mrs. Alice Lee Moyne, Washington, D. C. 5. The Moral Responsibility of Women in Heredity: Mrs. Helen M. Gardner, Boston, Mass.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON.

1. The Mother's Greatest Needs: Miss Frances Newton. 2. Play-Grounds: Miss Constance MacKensie, Philadelphia. 3. Some Practical Results of Child Study: Dr. G. Stanley Hall.

THURSDAY EVENING.

1. Reading Course for Mothers: Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster, New York City. 2. Presentation of Resolution, Press Com. of Women Friends, Baltimore, Md. 3. How to Guard our Youth against Bad Literature: Mr. Anthony Comstock, New York City.

FRIDAY MORNING.

1. Devotional: Mrs. H. M. Stinson, New York City. 2. Heredity: Mrs. W. H. Tilton, Carlsville, Ga. 3. Physical Culture: Miss Julia King, Boston, Mass. 4. Character Building vs. Education: Mrs. Ellen Richardson, Boston, Mass. 5. National Training School for Women: Mrs. S. A. Cotton, Falkland, N. C.

FRIDAY EVENING.

1. How Shall the Nation Secure Educated Mothers? Mrs. Stanton Blatch, New York City. 2. Club Organization: (a) Need of Organization: (b) How Organize: Mrs. Ellen W. Henrotin, Chicago, Ill.

This programme will be supplemented by additional features shortly. Mrs. Cleveland has expressed her attention of tendering a reception to the officers and delegates to the Congress on the morning of the 17th, and it is expected that many of the Cabinet ladies will also take a personal interest in the proceedings. The work of the Congress will be fully noticed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the information of mothers throughout the land, and an outline of the principle addresses to be delivered will appear in these columns.

Everybody, whether parent or not, is cordially invited to attend any or all of the sessions. Mrs. James H. McGill, chairman of the Entertainment Committee, can be addressed at the office, 1429 Twentieth street, Washington. In addition to the regular programme there will be special conferences on subjects pertaining to the interests of childhood, under the direction of Miss Frances Newton. The ablest speakers that can be secured will assist in this sectional work.

PERSIAN VILLAGERS UNDER THE "KOORSEE," OR FAMILY HEATER.

be 113 years of age, and she is the last surviving member of the little band that was gathered in the Alamo sixty years ago. She was nurse to Bowie. What changes have taken place in this world since first she saw the light of its sun! In the world of inventions, nearly all of our labor-saving machines and our convenience-making devices have been contrived. Long since her first day Elias Howe, the inventor of the sewing machine, was born, and has been in his grave an average lifetime. Since her birth the power of steam has been discovered; the steam engine has been perfected, continents have been iron-girdled with railroads, and the puff of the steam craft has been heard on all the lands and all the waters; the electric light and a score of other great inventions have been discovered. Kings, queens and empires have passed away, and the very face of the world has been changed.

Don't "Baby" the Children too Much.

A mother need not be a slave to her children when the little folks have attained the age of self-helpfulness. It is her duty to teach them this habit of self-help. Elsa Hofer Schriber, a noted kindergarten, writing on this subject, gives the following advice: "As soon as baby can walk, he can do his part. One proud father told me not long ago of his two year-old son's cise to good health and sound sense), of going to bed at reasonable hours is little more than a tradition. It is probably no exaggeration to say that one-half of the adult population in cities and towns do not seek their pillows till after the stroke of midnight, and a very considerable proportion of that half even at a much later hour. To enforce a curfew ordinance in such communities would be clearly out of the question. Matters are different, however, in rural districts and villages, where such a custom might be revived, by common consent, without interference with business or encountering opposition from any considerable portion of the community. The "Curfew bell" is supposed to have been introduced in England by William the Conqueror. At that time, almost all the houses in England were built of wood, and fires were of frequent occurrence. The object of the bell was to warn the people to put out their fires and retire for the night—to couver feu ("cover fire"). In summer it was rung at sunset, and about eight o'clock in the winter time. Those who did not attend to the signal had certain penalties imposed upon them. The practice of ringing the curfew seems to have prevailed in Europe long before the Norman conquest. In many parts of England the custom of ringing the bells at eight or nine p.m., still exists, but it has lost its original meaning.

MEN PROPOSE; WOMEN DECIDE.

"O, Mr. Lloyd," replied John McAslin. "I am not. A great fortune could keep the house pure by supplying funds for prosecutions. If members knew they would be called to account for bribery and corruption, for perjury and for every malfeasance of office, small and great, they would not render themselves liable to indictment. A great fortune could found free libraries in a large number of villages, and it is from healthy, intelligent villages that our large cities ought to be reinforced. A great fortune could found local hospitals sufficient for every need. Oh, there are so many ways, all equally noble and necessary, so many things that rich men could do, and be happy in the doing, far more happy than they are in collecting pictures or indulging themselves in luxury, or in simply amassing money."

"You are laying the regeneration of society and the elevation of the poor upon the rich," said Mrs. Lloyd. "It is too great a work for any class. Religion is the only power able for it. Suppose we denied ourselves to the uttermost, and gave all we possessed to the poor?"

"It would be as nothing without charity." "But is not giving up everything, charity?"

"No, indeed! The rich man must give himself as well as his gold. If he wants to taste the greatest blessing in the world, to know beforehand the very happiness of heaven, he must live for others. There is no true happiness till this law is fulfilled, and the vainest of things is to dream that denying self will do as well. To die to self we must live for others."

"I do not understand." "We must feel with others, be touched by their suffering, and busy for their happiness. We must do as Christ did, lay our hands upon the poor, and even the leper, and not stand afar off and throw them a piece of gold."

"But this is the business of the church," said Mrs. Lloyd, the church of the past, is dying now of its own respectability; the church of the future, must make the divine, secular; and the secular, divine."

"But how?" "It must cover the whole ground of ordinary life, with its multitude of interests and requirements. It is a miserably selfish religion which busies itself about what will happen when we die, which goes to church and repeats creeds, and totally ignores the great law of human brotherhood, set forth by Christ, as the very rule of his Kingdom."

"The world has got to be carried on, sir," said Mr. Lloyd, with a little temper. "and pray tell me, how is the law of human brotherhood to be brought into business? It is pure nonsense! Who cares for this 'brotherhood' question, when it is a matter of push, or the chance of making a corner, or of cutting prices, or of buying in the cheapest market? You may rant about equality, human brotherhood and liberty, but what does it amount to? There are no such things, in the market places of the world."

"Yet no one can deny that these very words represent the aspirations and hopes of untold millions. And if the church of the future does its duty, it will not leave a revolutionary press and atheistical expounders to be the only teachers to use them. The church of the future will take these magical words up in the name of God, and give to their truest and noblest conception."

"Your sister Jessie, Mr. McAslin, has often said to me, 'My brother John ought to be a preacher.' I agree with her," said Alice, "you have an evident 'call' for this church of the future—the church that shall teach the brotherhood of men, liberty and equality."

"There never can be any such thing as equality," said Mr. Lloyd.

"There is an equality and there is an inequality, and both are of the ordination of God. All men in his sight are of equal value. All according to their ability are equally responsible. But until men and women are born equally good and clever, equally healthy and industrious, inequality in this world must exist, and, indeed, as we advance in civilization, it will be more and more in evidence."

"Then you admit at least one irremediable evil?" said Mr. Lloyd. "I do not think this inequality an evil, quite the contrary. Is it an evil in the family where the weakness of age, the helplessness of infancy, or the sickness of one of its members, calls forth all that is beautiful and self-denying in love? Indeed it is not."

"You think then, Mr. McAslin," said Mrs. Lloyd, "that the weak member of a family—I mean weak in any respect—ought to be continually pitied, borne with and helped?"

"I do." "And what if he fails again and again?"

"He must be helped again and again. If there is some weakness to be borne with, there is always some good to be strengthened."

"Yes! yes! He must be helped again and again!" Her face flushed, her eyes were gleaming and tender.

But Mr. Lloyd rose up hastily, and with evident annoyance.

"Come! Come!" he said, "we have had enough, and more than enough of this. Let us go to the drawing-room and Alice will give us some music." But he was not any happier under the charm of song. In the midst of melody he could not keep Lord Medway out of his mind, nor yet look at his daughter without an uncomfortable feeling, though he kept privately assuring himself that he had only done his duty, and that in the long run Alice would thank him for doing it.

CHAPTER VI.

"WHAT AILS THIS HEART OF MINE?"

It was easy enough for Mr. Lloyd to reason himself out of everything he ought to believe and to feel; and while Alice and John were making melody, and forgetting all else, he slipped quietly out of the room. He wished to avoid any discussion about Lord Medway; for he believed that every hour the subject could be deferred, would make it more manageable. There was a little room on the ground floor which he called his private office, and thither he retired. Alice had never ventured to trouble his selfish seclusion at any time, and he threw himself on a comfortable lounge with the easy reflection that he was safe at least for that night.

In less than half an hour he was amazed to see his wife intrude upon his privacy. Such an event was unprecedented. He was not prepared in any way for a visit so unusual, and he asked with a show of anxiety, "Is any one ill? Is the house on fire? What remarkable thing has happened?"

"I have come to talk to you about Alice," she answered.

"This is a new departure," he said, scornfully. "Since when have you begun to consider your daughter's affairs?"

"If I have appeared remiss in the past, there is no necessity to continue the error. I wish to spare Alice as much as possible; and I know any conversation about Lord Medway will be painful to her."

"Your duty is to talk to her on that very subject. Any other mother would do so."

"I might talk to her in a way you would not approve. If she does not love Lord—"

"Love! love! love! It is all women think of. I don't believe there is such a thing. I intend Alice to marry Lord Medway, whether she imagines herself in love with him or not. The business part of the alliance is satisfactorily completed; if you have any regard for Alice's future, you will persuade her to get through the sentimental part as soon as possible. The young man will not wait too long on her fancies; not even for the pile of money he gets with her."

"We know, Nicholas, what a loveless marriage means."

"Yes, we do. You are right there."

"YOU OUGHT TO HAVE GONE INTO STOCKS, MARIAN," SAID MR. LLOYD.

"Do you wish Alice to suffer all I have suffered?"

"You have chosen to imagine yourself ill-used. I can't help that. You have had everything a woman needs to make her happy."

"Everything but love. It would have been better if I had had love and wanted everything else. I insist upon Alice having perfect freedom in the matter of marriage. She shall not be forced into a life she hates. I will protest against it even to the altar."

"What is the matter with you? And as for 'insisting,' that is sheer folly."

"You will not find it so. I came here to-night on business. I am ready to make a bargain with you, for it is the only argument you understand. You have a very large sum of money belonging to me in your hand, or in your business. You have it 'on call.' If you refuse the requests I am going to make, then I refuse to allow you the use of this money any longer. I shall instruct Telford to collect it at once."

He looked at her with anger and anxiety. "What do you want?" he asked.

"I want Alice to have her free will in the Medway matter. If she wishes to marry him I will not oppose her; if she does not wish to marry him, I will not have her frightened, or persuaded, or in any way talked into a loveless union; no, not for all the gold in America and all the nobility in Europe. And I must insist upon you authoritatively contradicting the statements made in to-day's papers."

"I cannot contradict them. I, myself, gave the reporters the main part of the information. Of course they added to it—"

"You must contradict it. You must say at any rate, that the news is premature, that Miss Lloyd's education is yet unfinished, and that her marriage will not be considered for at least another year. The restoration of Alice to her place, as a girl not yet in society, is imperative. It must be done."

"Have I been mistaken in you all these years? What makes you talk to me in this strain? You are surely out of your mind. I shall send a physician to see you to-morrow."

"Will you agree to these two things: contradict the report of to-day, and let Alice perfectly free to make her own decision about Lord Medway?"

"What if I do not agree?" "Then you will find it more difficult to pay Lord Medway the money you have promised him, than you imagine it to now."

"Ah! That is your move. Very clever indeed! Alice is to have her way or else you will make it impossible for me to have my way. Who put you up to this plan, Telford?"

"Will you do as I want you to do? will you give up my money?"

"I cannot possibly pay your money back at present. In some respects it would mean ruin to me. Why it turns me green to think of it!"

"In every respect it is ruin to any girl to marry without love. Alice may be spared a marriage she does not desire, you may be spared a repayment you dread by the small acts of simple justice. Will you do them?"

"I suppose I must. You ought to have gone into stocks, Marian, you drive a shrewd bargain—no consideration at all for a man's word, or bond, or feelings."

"Nicholas, when ever did you feel for a one's word, or bond, or feelings? Have you cared for my feelings? Or for poor Stephen's? Or for Alice's? I am no shrewd bargainer. If I could have appealed to your heart I never should have thought of your purse. Will you do to-morrow morning what I ask of you?"

"Yes—and what will you do?" "I will pay the price of it."

"Very well. You have made your bargain. I suppose Medway can see Alice to-morrow?"

"Certainly. I wish her to judge fairly. Let him ask for himself. Let her answer for herself."

With a calm "good-night," she then went away to the quiet little room which for many years been her place of meditation and prayer,—the room from which she had brought so often the peace that passeth understanding and the rest that earthly love can give. She was trembling all over, her heart beat rapidly, her face was set to her purpose, her eyes shined. But this "closet apart" was full of peace, the spiritual emanations of years clung to it. A great seriousness fell like a mantle all over her, and to be serious is to be at repose. It was not long before she could put the earth beneath her feet, then her soul, feeling its immortality, sat lightly upon its temporal perch, and knew a joy of utterance, a sense of divine presence, a serene amazement in which all troubled questions and conclusions were lost. Her face had a radiance that was not color, it was a direct spiritual effluence; the shining of the soul through mere flesh and blood, it is the soul that makes the body, and outward beauty seldom fails to express it outwardly.

The opening and shutting of a door, and a bar or two of a hunting song in which John and Alice's voices mingled, dissolved the glory and recalled her to temporal affairs. But, oh, the divine tranquility in which sorrow for Steve and her care for Alice were lost! Her own heart-longing, her heart-aching, and all the heaviness of life's great tragedy had become lighter than a grasshopper, and though the spiritual ebbed quickly out nothing could rob her of that felicitous repose it left behind.

In that prescient condition she saw clearly the end to which Alice and John McAslin were drifting, and the knowledge brought no fear with it. "He is a good man," she said softly, "and he loves her; he will neither meddle nor make, nor in any way try to influence her, for a hand wiser than mine is weaving their destiny."

LITTLE WORRIES.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week beginning Feb. 21. Psalm 121:1-8; John 14:1.

HOW to get rid of our little worries, is a problem not easily solved. Perhaps it is not possible to solve it at all by that way of approach. The worry will come, so long as we are in the flesh. Business, in the home, in the church—everywhere there are annoyances, disappointments, vexations. Things will not go our way. People around us will not do as we would have them. We are thwarted when we are conscious of meaning well and doing right. Disagreeable things that we have no power to change, provide a continuous source of annoyance. Losses and trials proceeding from our own misapprehension, forgetfulness, or mistakes of which we can blame no one but ourselves, involve us in chagrin and mortification. Even our best efforts, to which we have given earnest thought and strenuous endeavor, fail of success. Worries about ourselves, our health, our work, our responsibilities, our future; worries about others, about the consequences of habits they are forming, about the disasters that the course they are taking may involve—all these worries and a multitude of others are our inheritance in this life. Like the fiends in the demoniac whom Christ cured, every might say, "My name is legion, for we are many."

It is as very certain, we cannot escape these things, if we cannot get rid of our little worries, the philosophic course is to learn how to bear them. To get an armor which their stings cannot penetrate, is the next best thing to getting rid of them altogether. If such an armor can be had, it will abundantly repay all the trouble of getting it. It will save a fearful expenditure of nervous force and keep us from spending many miserable hours. It will be a benefit to others as well as ourselves, for if we worry and fret we make all about us uncomfortable. Nothing is more contagious than worry, so that the worrying person is not only a source of annoyance to his friends, but produces a fretfulness in them which indefinitely extends the trouble. One of the greatest of modern philosophers passed a long life of martyrdom to this misery and made life a burden to all around him. It is worth while, therefore, to find out how to escape the suffering.

One or two common sense rules may be of service by way of suggesting others. It will help to attain the invulnerable condition if we keep clearly in mind the fact that this life is an education, a discipline. If we are able to regard the little worries as tests, instead of pests, something to try our mettle, there is a certain glory which the mind readily appreciates in showing ourselves superior to them. By resisting to be irritated, by calling up our strength of endurance to retain our tranquility we may acquire the habit of not being easily moved. "Greater is that ruleth his spirit," said the wise king, "than he who taketh a city." That is worth having, and it is given to the man who, in the midst of annoyance can keep his equanimity. Another useful rule is to resist the tendency to brooding. The poet says truly,

There's many a trouble, would burst like a bubble,
And into the waters of Lethe depart,
If we do not rehearse it and tenderly nurse it,
And give it a permanent place in the heart;
There's many a sorrow would vanish to-morrow,
Were we but willing to furnish the wings;
It sadly intruding, and quietly brooding,
It hatches out all sorts of horrible things.

By acquiring the power of dismissing the irritation from the mind and of thinking of other things, or going cheerfully to work that occupies the mind with practical purpose the little worry whatever it may be is disarmed of its worst power. At the best of all rules is that the Psalmist put in practice. "I will lift mine eyes to the hills, from whence cometh my help. My help cometh from the Lord who made heaven and earth." How many have tried this source of strength and have found it true that he keeps them in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on him. These are the people who prove by experience that all things work together for good to them that love God.

SOUL AHOY.

SOUL ahoy! Take on the Pilot,
Jesus, Master of the sea.
On life's ocean falsest signals
Lure the soul in treachery.

Soul ahoy! The mist grows thicker:
Danger lurks beneath the wave,
O, sail not alone in peril;
Take the Pilot who will save.

Soul ahoy! Like gales on ocean,
Growing to a hurricane,
Youthful sins, misconduct, follies,
Overwhelming power attain.

Soul ahoy! The darkness deepens;
Grief and pain and death o'ershade;
But with Jesus Christ for Pilot,
Trusting souls are not afraid.

REFRAIN:

Soul ahoy! Take on the Pilot,
Jesus, steadfast, safe and true.
Come what may of mists and tempests,
He will pilot safely through.

FAITH.

WE will not weep; for God is standing by us,
And tears will blind us to the blessed sight:
We will not doubt; if darkness still doth try us,
Our souls have promise of serenest light.

We will not faint; if heavy burdens bind us,
They press no harder than our souls can bear.—
The thorniest way is lying still behind us,
We shall be braver for our past despair.

Oh, not in doubt shall be our journey's ending;
Sin with its fears shall leave us at the last,—
All its best hopes in glad fulfilment blending,
Life shall be with us when the death is past.

Help us, O Father! when the world is pressing
On our frail hearts, that faint without their friend,—
Help us, O Father! let thy constant blessing
Strengthen our weakness till the joyful end.

TWO STAGES OF ADVENT.

How Christ Will Come for His People, and Afterwards With His People.

BY PASTOR JOHN WAITE.

OUR Lord says in Matt. 24, that at his second coming there shall be two grinding at the mill—one ready for the coming Lord and the other not; the one who is ready is taken and the other left. Two working in a field, and two grinding at the mill, are simply illustrations of what is taking place every day. The idea is that people shall be working together. It may be in the field, in the factory, in the warehouse, in the office or the exchange. It matters not where while on earth serving the Lord; Christ will receive them unto himself when he comes into the air for that purpose.

The coming of Christ is well called the "purifying hope," seeing that it inspires us with the desire to grow up in the likeness of Christ in this life, and thus be prepared by the Holy Spirit for that sudden and momentous change which will take place in us at the trumpet blast that will call us to be forever with the Lord. It is highly probable that this trumpet blast will not be heard by the unconverted living, and certainly it will not be heard by the unconverted dead, for it is written, "The rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished" (Rev. 20: 5).

After Christ has come as a "thief in the night," and taken away "those that are ready," the world will awake to the fact that they have gone. From many places men, women, and children will be missing. It will probably not be too much to say that Christendom will be for a time disorganized. How can it be otherwise, seeing that people will be taken from all positions and spheres? If this wonderful scene should take place just as the services are being held in the churches, it will suddenly prove to a surprised world who are ready and who are not.

Many suggestions will be made by the sophists of the world as to the meaning of the phenomenon. Many will offer their vain solutions of the mystery. But it will be left for those who possess some knowledge of the word of God to show to the world what has really happened. Doubtless it will occur to some that they used to hear their minister preach of such things; and they will be inclined to read their Bibles to refresh their memories as to the things pertaining to the coming of the Lord and the taking away of his church. And to their horror and surprise they will discover that the awful event has really happened, and that the wise virgins are gone, and they themselves, the foolish virgins, are left behind to mourn and regret their negligence and folly. For long had the cry sounded in their midst, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him," but their ears were dull and their eyes were blind, and while they were busy here and there, lo! the Lord had come.

How terrible these things will be to those who have filled positions as ministers, clergymen, Sunday School teachers, or church officers, holding the truth in righteousness in one hand and the love of the world or honor and reputation in the other. Many who have filled these positions will be amongst those foolish virgins who will be left behind and shut out from the presence of the Lord when he comes as bridegroom to receive his bride.

Antichrist, or man of sin, will then begin to carry out his awful work as the great "desolator" that maketh desolate.

The "ten horns," representing ten kings (of the countries of Caesar's original Roman Empire) will unite in submitting to the Antichrist, and handing themselves and their authority, and their nations, as such, over to him for him to use them as his administrators.

He will seek to overturn and stamp out everything and everyone who will not submit to him; so that there will be the most terrible persecution that the world has ever experienced.

Then, in the midst of that terrible slaughter, Christ will be seen coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory, accompanied by his church and hosts of angels to take vengeance on his foes.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

TIME ENOUGH.

AN old saint once said, when somebody complained in her hearing that there never was time enough to accomplish all one wanted to, "For my part I don't know what you mean by such talk. You have all the time there is!"

Saints, both old and young, can be very provoking, and that is what this good woman was, I have no doubt, though nobody can complain that there was any lack of truth in her remark. It is certainly true that all the time there is here on earth is at our disposal, and yet some of us spend our days in a hurrying chase after the flying moments, and we wish the days were some hours longer than they are.

We talked this over the other night at our Monday Club. If we could only take you in, dear reader, you would help us discuss some of the questions which are always arising, but the next best thing to belonging to a club is hearing about it when the folks go home. Our Monday Club was started by the college girls in a certain little town, to keep green in memory the good times they had had in their alma mater. Naturally, after awhile, some of the girls married, and then the club widened and took in husbands. Sweethearts could not easily be excluded after that, nor brothers, and bye and bye the Monday Club admitted a few dear mothers, and benignant grand-mothers, indignant fathers and courtly grand-fathers, and now it comes to pass that it is a circle of friends and neighbors which practically admits the whole town.

Said Mrs. Meredith, sinking into an easy chair, and folding her hands, "I don't know what it is, but I am tired to death, or nearly so. I've been on the jump since I got up this morning, and when I thought I was through Reuben came in asking me if I couldn't put new neck-bands on his shirts. Fancy! There isn't a thing in the way of sewing so hard to do as that."

"Yes," plaintively added Uncle Ben Searles, "So the ladies always say. I could put a band on a shirt I am sure without any fuss!"

"I'd like to see you try," said Susie Perkins. "I believe in throwing shirts into the rag bag when they are worn out, but men are more saving than women, and they just hug their old clothes, and are reluctant to give them up when they're in ribbons. The real trouble is that women have so much to do, they never have any time to spend on nice careful mending, that takes time."

"Look at me?" The speaker was Margaret Money Penny, a teacher in the public school. "I rise at five every morning, make the fire, get the breakfast, put our rooms in order, and leave everything where mamma, who is helpless, can reach it with the least exertion. At half-past eight I go to school, and I never leave it till four or half-past four. Then I bring exercises home to correct and compositions to look over, and our dinner is to get, mother's and mine, and you may say that I'm busy and tired out, when night comes, blessed night!"

The minister's wife next spoke. She has six children, and she makes a great many parish calls, presides at the sewing society, does a large part of her own housework, consoles the minister when things go wrong, smooths out a dozen social tangles every day of her life, and, it is whispered, is writing a book. She has written one. We have it in our Sunday-school library, and are proud of her name on the title page.

Mrs. Leavens is a capital minister's wife, which is saying that she would be a good wife to any man in any profession. Hers is the art of never looking bothered, never seeming worried, and to see her when you will, and sometimes it must be inconvenient to receive friends, she is never anything but placid and pleasant. No wonder we appealed to her.

"Friend," she said, in her low, even tones, "the only art I know of is to do the next thing, do it with all your might, and leave the rest to the Lord's appointment. Interruptions come, but if we accept them as part of the day's work, without fretting or complaint, they will weave themselves into life's pattern and make the work more beautiful. I am more fortunate than most of you in having so large a family. The children are my helpers."

Would anybody else have said that? But I think the dear lady is right. A large family makes no more trouble when all is said than a small one, and if the older children are well started, the younger ones step right along in happy, orderly ways, and help more than they hinder.

But the final result of my thinking it over, after the club had dissolved was, that

A heart at leisure from itself
To soothe and sympathize, will always find time sufficient to make the rough places plain, and to set the desert to blossoming like a rose. Such a loving heart is a sunshine-maker everywhere, and life grows serene and sweet under its tender influence.

The Women of Seville.

In a letter from Seville, in the St. Louis Christian Advocate, Dora M. Jones gives this pleasant picture of home life in the ancient Spanish city: "Here we had a typical Spanish picture, plants and creepers in pots growing along the veranda, and two women in black, the traditional garb of the Sevillana, with gold ornaments in their carefully-dressed, glossy, black hair, walking up and down, plying the indispensable fan, and turning their heads to one another as they walked with a swan-like grace. This elegance of gait and attitude is very marked in the Seville women: one maid-servant in the street talking to another will display a perfection of pose, an ease of gesture, a self-possessed grace which we attribute to the highest class of our own society, and do not always find there."

BLINDNESS PREVENTED. THE ABSORPTION TREATMENT A SUCCESS.

NO MORE WAITING TO BE BLIND.

THE New York Observer says: "In the absorption treatment we find the most successful and humane method of treating diseased eyes or weakened vision ever devised. It is a boon to suffering humanity, hundreds having been successfully treated at the Bemis Sanitarium for diseases of the eyes often said to be incurable, without the knife or risk; and as the treatment assists Nature to do its own work without the use of drugs, the patients feel that a new lease of life as well as eyesight has been given them. Among the grateful patients we find the Rev. B. N. Palmer, D.D., of New Orleans, La., well known to our readers. Dr. Palmer, some two years ago, noticed his eyesight failing, and consulted Dr. Knapp, of New York, and Dr. Pope, of New Orleans, who diagnosed the case as atrophy. After being under treatment one year, they pronounced his case hopeless, and further treatment was abandoned. On July 24th, 1896, one eye being nearly sightless and the other failing, he consulted E. H. Bemis, Eye Specialist, of the Glens Falls, N. Y., Sanitarium, remarking that he had 'nothing to lose and a great deal to gain,' as cataracts were forming which would make blindness sure, and the little sight left was only available with the aid of a strong magnifying-glass. On Sept. 7th, six weeks after commencing the absorption treatment, the strong lens had been laid aside, and the glasses discarded years ago now enable him to read again, to the great surprise of himself and friends."

The following is an extract of a letter from Dr. Palmer to an investigator regarding the above treatment: "Almost by every mail I receive letters of inquiry as to my experience of the treatment of my eyes. His theory is rational, based upon the self-restoring power of nature herself. Medicine cures only by rousing a peccant organ to the performance of its duty, when disease is thrown off and the patient recovers. The eye, he thinks, should form no exception. His aim therefore is to stimulate the eye, promote its secretions and increase the circulation thus revitalizing the eye and enabling it to fulfill its functions; it throws off all the troubles repairs and its own waste. His method is simple, safe, in no way unpleasant, without disfigurement."

In order to bring before the public the advantages of the absorption treatment, which does away with all risk in treating the eyes, and furnishes a home treatment which can be safely used at the patient's home when it is impossible to visit the Sanitarium, we would state that a valuable pamphlet will be forwarded to any address free, and should be read in every family, as it gives the cause of failing eyesight and diseased eyes, how prevented and cured. The rapid increase in the number of persons who are becoming blind and relying upon artificial aid to see demands a treatment which will reach the cause.

Requests for Prayer.

A the Converts' Sunday Evening Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission, prayer was offered on Jan. 24, in accordance with the requests of many persons, among whom the following ask the prayers of our readers:

Conversion "Sister in Christ," of Relatives and Friends. East Harland, Conn., asks prayer for the conversion of a drinking man who abuses his Christian wife and who seems to have no reverence for God. "Sister in Christ," City of Mexico, that an unfaithful husband may see the wickedness of his sin, and seek from God forgiveness for his sin, and strength to resist temptation. "Reader, Good River, Nebraska, that the of three families might quit their evil ways and go to the Lord for salvation from all sin." "Anxious Sister, Kellerton, Ia., on behalf of a beloved brother, who has had severe physical trouble and has turned for comfort to things, that God would take pity on him and his wife and bring them both into his care." "Believer, Mt. Vernon, Ill., that the brothers and sisters, now all unsaved, may be led to seek Christ." "Subscriber, Wt., for the conversion of a dear son whose evil ways have been a great grief for years, and who could do so much good were in the Lord's service." "Believer, Iowa Falls, Wis., for the conversion of a son and a niece." "Anxious Teacher, for conversion of some members of a Sunday school who have wandered away, for whose conversion and reclamation many prayers are being offered; also that an aged couple, indifferent to their eternal interests, may be aroused to seek salvation." "E. H. S., Philadelphia, for the conversion of her daughter and granddaughter, and that God would provide for their need." "L. B. Bewick, Pa., for the conversion of a son-in-law." "Reader, Massey, N. Y., for the salvation of a father and son, a victim of drink." "Mother, Montevideo, that her five sons and her daughter may all give their hearts to God and be made obedient." "Reader, Huntsville, Kan., that a father and mother who are growing old, but are still unsaved, might seek Christ, and for the salvation of brothers and sisters." "Sub-Editor, Smyth Co., Va., for the salvation of one of whom has formed an infatuation which will bring ruin on himself and disgrace on his family." "Anxious Mother, Detroit, for the conversion of her children, especially of one who needs grace to save him from becoming a drunkard." "Friend, Frank- N. Y., that a young man who earnestly desires to become a Christian may trust in Christ and find peace." "Reader, Chicago, Ill., that a dear brother and his wife may give their hearts to the Lord and learn to trust him in the blessings they need." "Constant Reader, Western Michigan, for the conversion of a man who for a number of years has neglected his devoted wife and is now making her miserable by persecution." "Praying Father, Parkport, N. Y., that her husband and other, for whose conversion many prayers have been offered, may both turn to the Lord for salvation." "E. R., Camden, Tenn., for the conversion of the family of a widow, and that all of them might become children of God." "Mother, Spencer, N. Y., that her son who is giving her cause for grave concern, may cease to associate with ungodly companions, and may give herself to the Lord." "H. New York, on behalf of a nephew neglecting his trail wife and children, spending his money in saloons, that he may be the error of his ways and turn to the Lord." "Mother, Omaha, Neb., that a lovable man who has yielded to temptation may have strength to pass safely through an arduous ordeal, and may through the power of the Holy Spirit be led to consecrate himself to Christ." "Sorrowing Sister, Kiowa, for the conversion of a dear brother who has fallen from God." "Reader, Millersburg, that a loving husband who is earnestly seeking Christ, may find him and be made obedient to the Lord's." "W. F. D., Cameron, Mo., for the conversion of two sons who are in the grip of strong drink, of a man who is deaf and blind, of a Christian wife, and of a man whose relatives have prayed for him postulated with him in vain.

Restoration Afflicted Reader, St. Paul, Minn., asks prayer for the recovery of a daughter now in an asylum for the insane. "T. A. S., Jamison City, Pa., for his recovery from an acute nervous disease which prevents her caring properly for her children." "O. M. W., La Fayette, Ind., that a dear sister who has suffered long and hard, and despairs of recovery may be healed by the Great Physician." "Mother, Newark, for the health of body and mind to be given to a daughter who has been long a sufferer from nervous trouble." "M. R., New York, for two poor women, one of them a widow, who know a man by the company he keeps. If he is a Hood's Sarsaparilla regularly you can rest that his blood is pure, his appetite keen and health the best. Try it yourself.

may recover their health so that they might support their children. — Reader, Skowhegan, Me., for the recovery of a sick brother. — C. A. R., Wills Point, Tex., that a dear son may recover his sight so that he may earn an honest livelihood. — M. F. K., Hinton, W. Va., that her daughter and daughter-in-law may be restored to health. — A. A. B., Bath, N. Y., for the recovery of a beloved mother, an earnest Christian, who has long been an invalid. — Believer, Fort Recovery, O., that God in his great mercy would restore a sister who has been a great sufferer for many years, and also that a dear mother may recover her reason. — Anxious Mother, Plainfield, N. J., for the recovery of her son who is threatened with consumption. — "Sister in Christ," Allegheny, Pa., that a dear mother who has been an invalid for many years may be healed and be saved from becoming helpless. — Earnest Friend, Kent, Conn., that a dear boy now sick with typhoid fever may be fully restored. The following persons whose maladies are known to the Lord earnestly desire prayers for recovery: Sufferer, Hamburg, Mich.; Two trusting sisters; Reader, Virginia, Ill.; Believer, Rolling Prairie, Ind.; M. A. C., Cal.; "One who loves the Lord," Rochester, Minn.

For Special Invalid, New Albany, Ind. Blessings. begs earnest prayer for deliverance from an impending calamity which threatens to render homeless a family already afflicted. God, who hears prayer alone, can avert the evil. — Believer, Forest City, Pa., that a young man who is greatly discouraged by loss of property and failure to obtain employment, may succeed in getting work. — "Brother," Kansas City, Mo., that God would provide a way of escape out of heavy financial difficulties. — W. A. P., Liverpool, Kans., that a family may be delivered from malicious persecution and that the persecutors may see the evil of their conduct. — Believer, New Woodstock, N. Y., that a dear daughter who has been vainly seeking employment for several weary months might be guided to an open door. — Believer, Akron, Ia., for help in a financial crisis. — "Sister, Wills Point, Tex., that a despondent man who is separated from his family may soon find the employment he is seeking. — Afflicted Mother, that a dear son now in Springfield, Ill., who has fallen under the power of an insidious drug may be emancipated from his bondage by the power of Christ. — Subscriber, Columbus, O., who has long been out of employment, that in some way he may find work by which he can earn an honest livelihood. — Reader, New Brunswick, N. J., that God would give special help in a time of financial stress and open the way to the punctual discharge of obligations. — Widow, New York, who has a child to support, that in some way God would enable her to make an honest living for her little one, and that her faith in the God who has promised to be a father to the fatherless and a husband to the widow, may not fail her in her time of sorrow. — Member, Vinola, Pa., that a struggling little church may be enabled to raise the money to pay its pastor's salary. — Believer, Philadelphia, Pa., for the revival of God's work in a church in the suburbs whose members are worldly. — Sympathizer, Chicago, Ill., that God in whose hand are all things, would send a revival of business to relieve the terrible destitution.

Persons desiring the prayers of the Converts' Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission should address their letters to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 91-102 Bible House, New York.

who sends us his or her name and address, and the name of this paper before March 1st, will receive our new illustrated catalogue, together with a rebate ticket good for one dollar towards the purchase of a Caw's "Dashaway" or Caw's "Safety" Fountain Pen, the catalogue price of which is $2 or more, with our guarantee to redeem the pen at our catalogue price, if returned one month later.

LIKE FINDING A DOLLAR.

You get a rebate ticket good for a dollar for the asking, and when you are ready to buy a Pen you use the ticket in paying for it.

Well, you say: "Suppose I buy a Pen listed at say $2 or $3. I pay $1 or $2 in cash and use the ticket to settle the balance. Now, suppose I wish to return the Pen after a month's trial, do you mean to say you will give me back the money I paid and $1 additional?"

That is exactly what we mean, and that is precisely what we will do if the Pen has not been abused.

You may apply in person at our Store, 168 Broadway, New York, or by mail, as you prefer. Just let us have your name and address and the name of this paper and we will do the rest, but not more than one ticket will be sent to each applicant.

We have faith in our Pens or we would not make such an offer. Our faith rests on the thousands of testimonials from well-informed men and women from all parts of the world. We believe that every one will acknowledge the superiority of Caw's Pens over all others after a trial.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND said:

"I find Caw's 'Dashaway' very valuable as a signature Pen."

EX-PRESIDENT HARRISON said:

"The second 'Dashaway' Pen received and just suits me. The first one I gave to Mrs. Harrison, and she is using it with great satisfaction."

Among the tens of thousands of users of Caw's Pens we know of none who would sell at cost price. We are curious to know how many takers there will be of our offer of an advance of $1 on the cost price, and we are also curious to know (it will be worth to us all it costs) which newspaper is the best advertising medium, therefore we make this offer conditional on each applicant naming the paper in which he reads this advertisement. This offer will not be repeated nor the time extended.

HEROIC PERSONALITIES

By REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

On the Edge of a Crevasse.

NANSEN, the Arctic hero of the hour, has almost every element that is adapted to arouse the admiration and enthusiasm of those who love the strong, the daring and heroic in mankind. He is a man of splendid stature, and trained as he has been from his childhood to all the virtues of the athlete, he is one of the most rugged and tireless specimens of physical manhood the world affords today. He has succeeded where other men failed, not only because of his dauntless courage, but because nature and training have fitted him to perform feats of physical endurance that few men in the world could accomplish.

Once, on his arrival in London, he mingled in a great crowd at Buckingham Palace, and pushed himself up to the front just as the Princess of Wales arrived to hold a drawing-room. As he was waving his hat with the crowd in honor of the Princess, he felt a twitch at his watch chain, and knew that he was being plied by a pick-pocket. But Nansen had altogether too cool a head to let such a little thing excite him, as would have been the case with a smaller man. He simply dropped his left hand and let its giant like grip grasp the wrist of the thief. Without even looking to see who it was he continued to cheer and wave his hat aloft in his right hand until the enthusiasm subsided. Then he quietly handed his prisoner over to a policeman. Nansen said he merely held the man tightly, but the miserable wretch was howling with pain and declared that he would rather go to prison than have his bones crushed.

On one occasion when returning to their camp after an absence, they saw their canoes drifting from land with all their provisions and necessities of life. To reach the boats was a matter of life or death. Not to reach them was certain death. The great qualities of the explorer came out quick as a lightning flash, without a moment's hesitation, he sprang into the ice cold water and swam after the drifting canoes. He was chilled to the bone, but he succeeded in his object, and brought the canoes safely back to camp. It was no group of weaklings that Nansen had with him, either. One incident reminds us of the story of David. On one occasion, while dragging their sledges along a narrow path, they were suddenly confronted by a Polar bear. But Nansen, a fit companion for Nansen, caught the great beast by the throat and held him at arm's length, while his chief went on his way with his rifle.

Perhaps no twitter of birds ever fell more sweetly on human ears than those which Nansen describes in "The first Crossing of Greenland." As they were breakfasting in their walled tent in the midst of the ice desert of the desolate North, they were astonished to hear, as they thought, the twittering of a bird outside, but the sound soon stopped, and they were not at all certain of its reality. But as they were starting again after their one o'clock dinner that day, they suddenly became aware of twitterings in the air, and, as they stopped, sure enough they saw a snow-bunting come flying after them. It wandered around them two or three times, and plainly showed signs of a wish to sit upon one of their sledges. But the necessary audacity was not forthcoming, and it finally settled on the snow in front for a few moments, before it flew away for good with another encouraging little twitter.

Very welcome indeed was that little bird, for it gave them a friendly greeting from the land they were sure must now be near. Nansen says: "We blessed it for its cheering song, and with warmer hearts and renewed strength we confidently went on our way." How many such snow-buntings of hope God sends to cheer and warm the hearts of those who face hardship and peril with unshaken intrepidity and courageous purpose!

But even in sight of land they came near losing their lives. As the wind came up very strong in the afternoon they sought to travel more rapidly by setting sail on their sledges and using them as ice boats. Their ships flew over the waves and drifts of snow with a speed that almost took their breath away. But after a time, as it was growing dusk, Dr. Nansen ran ahead of the sledges on his snowshoes to make sure that they should not come to any sudden disaster. It was well he did this, as this prudence saved their lives. As they were rushing along through the dense, driving snow, he suddenly saw, in the general obscurity, something dark lying right in their path. He took it for some ordinary irregularity in the snow and unconcernedly steered straight ahead. The next moment, however, he found that they were on the edge of a chasm broad enough to swallow sledges, steersman and passengers. A single moment later and they would have forever disappeared, and have been more completely lost to the world than was the fated Dr. Franklin. In such a case the world would have been consciously poorer.

DEAR SIR:—In March last I was suffering from a severe catarrhal cold. My right ear was almost totally deaf, and the ringing in it was exceedingly annoying. I purchased an outfit and commenced its use, continuing through the day as I would have opportunity. About 5 p. m. the congestion in the eustachian tube disappeared, my hearing was fully restored, and I have since had no recurrence. Since then I have, on several occasions, checked and cured bronchial colds, and I have no hesitancy in recommending it. Very truly yours, C. D. LAW.

Guarantee. I will refund the money to all persons purchasing Booth's Pocket Inhaler Outfit anywhere in the United States, during 1897, who will say that HYOMEI has done them no good, on condition that they apply direct to the head office, 23 East 20th Street, New York City. (Signed) R. T. Booth

Hyomei is a purely vegetable antiseptic, and destroys the germs which cause disease in the respiratory organs. The air, charged with Hyomei, is inhaled at the mouth, and, after permeating the mucous air-cells, is exhaled slowly through the nose. It is aromatic, delightful to inhale, and gives immediate relief. It is highly recommended by physicians, clergymen, and thousands who have been helped and cured.

Pocket Inhaler Outfit Complete, by Mail, $1; (for foreign countries add $1.00 per outfit) consists of pocket inhaler, a bottle of Hyomei, a dropper and directions for using. If you are skeptical, send your address; my pamphlet shall prove that Hyomei cures. Are you open to conversion? Extra bottles of Hyomei Inhalant by mail, or at druggists, 50 cents. Hyomei Balm for all skin diseases, 25 cents. Your druggist has Hyomei or can get it for you if you insist. Don't accept a substitute. ARMENIA'S ORPHANS.

The Movement for Their Rescue Progressing Favorably—American Sympathy Appreciated.

LETTERS received from the mission workers in Asiatic Turkey, during the week indicate that the effort to rescue the homeless and helpless Armenian children in orphanages, and save from the fatal Mohammedans, is making excellent progress. This great, Christ-like movement is everywhere meeting with the hearty approval and support. Rev. Cyrus H. Kimball, the father of Protestant Missions in Turkey, has declared it to be a "call for Christian benevolence to achieve one of the noblest works." Dr. Grace N. Kimball, the devoted missionary who conducted THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's relief work at Van last year, and who knows whereof she speaks, says: "Orphans by thousands are wandering, helpless and homeless." Thanks to the quick aid rendered by God's people in America and elsewhere, many of the homeless ones are being cared for and sheltered by loving hands, and will not again be exposed to the peril of life-long slavery and degradation. But much remains to be accomplished. Twenty-five dollars covers the entire cost of clothing, feeding, sheltering and educating an Armenian boy or girl for a whole year. At Orfa, where Miss Shattuck is in charge of the work, there is a large number of orphans who are being cared for as rapidly as the funds placed at the disposal of the missionaries will permit.

If you do, you will be interested in knowing that Kola Plant, a new botanical discovery found on Congo River, West Africa, is pronounced an unproved cure for the disease. Most marvelous cures wrought by this new plant, when all other remedies fail. Rev. G. Ellsworth Stump, Pastor the Congregational Church, Newell, Iowa, writes that the Kola Plant cured him of severe asthma of twenty years' standing. Alfred C. Wis, Editor of the Farmer's Magazine, of Washington, D. C., testifies that it cured him when he did not lie down at night without fear of choking. Many others give similar testimony. It is the most wonderful discovery. To prove to you beyond doubt its wonderful curative power, the Kola Importing Company, No. 1164 Broadway, New York, will send a large case of the Kola Compound free by mail to every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who suffers from any form of Asthma. They only ask in return, that when cured yourself, you will tell your neighbors about it. This is very true, and you should surely try it, as it costs you nothing.

This Waist with Bolero

TO Every One

HOW many words do you think you can correctly spell with the letters in the word

MANUFACTURERS' P Using each letter as desired, but not more times than it appears in Manufacturers'—foreign words do not count. Work it out as follows: Am. Can. Cans. Cnres. Ram. Same. Fact. Facts. Fracture. Manufacturers. etc. Words spelled alike but having different meanings count as one.

Our Offer.—We will pay $100 for the largest list, $50 for the second largest, $25 for the third, $10 each for the next five, $5 each for the next ten, and $1 each for the next twenty-five. That is to say we will divide among forty-three contestants the aggregate sum of $300 according to merit. Don't you think you could be one of the forty-three. TRY IT.

Our Purpose.—The above rewards for mental effort are given free and without consideration for the purpose of attracting attention to MODES, by May Mantion, the most popular up-to-date Fashion Magazine in the world. Its 36 pages, replete with beautiful illustrations of the latest styles in ladies' misses' and children's garments, make it a real necessity in every household. The Designs and Fashion Hint being by May Mantion, render it invaluable as an absolutely reliable Fashion Guide.

Our Conditions.—You must send with your list of words 25 cents stamps or silver for a Three Month's Trial Subscription to MODES.

Our Extra Inducement.—Every person sending 25 cents and a list of 15 words or more, will, in addition to three months' subscription, receive by return mail a pattern of this stylish waist with Bolero No. 6972 illustrated above, in any size from 32 to 40 inches bust measure.

Our Aim.—The present monthly circulation of MODES exceeds 100,000. We aim to make it 200,000. This contest will close March 15th next so the names of successful spellers may be published in the following issue of MODES, but SEND IN YOUR LIST AT ONCE. For our responsibility we refer you to any Mercantile Agency. Address: MODES FASHION MAGAZINE, Dept. 454, 130 WHITE STREET, NEW YORK.

Free Trip to Jerusalem

In 1900 the Holy Land will be the goal of world wide travel. A Council of Christendom will more than likely be held in Jerusalem, and, if so, it will surpass in importance and thrilling interest any human gathering since the time of Christ. There will be a splendid opportunity for a universal conference over plans for the Christianization of the entire globe in the century which is soon to dawn. ✕ ✕ ✕ To render it possible for everybody to take this trip who has the desire to do so, THE RAM'S HORN has made the bold offer to provide a reasonable amount of work whereby a free trip to the Holy Land may easily be earned. It also has arranged to allow its tourists to stop at the Great International which will be held during the same year. This proposition is so huge that one can easily believe that full details and information cannot be given in this small space, but every number of THE RAM'S HORN is full of this project and those who do not wish to become yearly subscribers may secure this wonderful paper eight months, thirty six times, on trial, for the small sum of a ONE DOLLAR BILL.

REMEMBER: That for only one dollar you secure nearly a whole year's subscription to which Chaplain McCabe says should have a MILLION SUBSCRIBERS. It is getting them fast. Send one dollar for the paper and read every issue for details of our Free Trip to Paris and the Holy Land.

SHORT VIEWS.

It helps us bear life's burdens,
And brings us comfort, peace,
To think how short the journey,
Ere burden-bearing ceases.
This flower of rarest comfort
Is gathered in the way
Of death's dark-falling shadow
That ends the earthly day!
So short the way!

Golden the hours spent under Light of the world to come;
By hope of new life brooded,
The resurrection home.
How small the sad day's trouble
Would seem if we but knew
How short the little moment
Ere it will all be through!
So short the way!

A little while—so little,
We hasten one by one,
The day of toil is over,
We lay all burdens down.
And then how sweet the resting
Within our father's home,
And we go out, no more,
When we have safely come.
How short the way!

So, with each new day given
To bear a weary load,
Look but a little distance
Over the onward road.
Only one day is given Rest in the Lord to-day—
Casting all care upon him—
Short views—still trust and pray.
So short the way!

Savages Once, Christians Now.

IN a recent issue THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gave an account of the evangelistic and civilizing agencies that are at work among the Indian tribes. A letter from a Texas pastor, just received, affords a striking instance in corroboration and is accompanied by the interesting photographs that appear on this page. The letter says: "These are the picture of two Christian Indians of the Alabama tribe in Polk County, Texas. They are among the first fruits of the Gospel in that tribe, and they present a marked difference from their appearance when the writer first visited their tribe, fifteen or twenty years ago, and saw them in their savage dress, and in gross ignorance of Christianity. Both these men are married and have two or three children. They are bright, and write and speak English fairly well. They lead in prayer and speak in their prayer-meetings, and are both ruling elders in the Indian Presbyterian Church. They are farmers, and are now grappling with necessities caused by drought and crop failures. Yet they are now attending school, and propose to do so for a few months at least, in order to fit themselves better to be Christian workers in their tribe. They need aid that they may be trained for Christian usefulness."

JOSEPH SYLVESTINE.

DAVIS SYLVESTINE.

Chinese Slaves in California.

IT is estimated that there are 2,500 Chinese women and girls in San Francisco, of whom about 1,500 are slaves. These girls, says a writer in THE WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY JOURNAL, may be divided into two classes: the muy tai or bond servants and those imported for improper purposes. It is the custom among poor families in China where girls are plentiful to sell one or two of their daughters to wealthy families as servant girls. The price paid depends upon the age, character, and personal appearance of the girl. A good looking girl, ten years of age in Canton can be bought for $150. Before the purchase is completed she is carefully examined to be sure that she has no hereditary taint. If she is found to be healthy, a contract is executed between her parents and the purchaser, in which it is stipulated that she shall not be sold for immoral purposes, that she shall be kindly treated, provided with wholesome food and suitable clothing until she is eighteen or nineteen years of age, when her owner is bound to provide her with a husband who pays her redemption money, and she is henceforth a free woman. These muy tais are to be found in the homes of nearly every well-to-do Chinese family in California. They are employed to wait upon the ladies of the home, to nurse the babies, and to drudge about the house. Scores of these little girls may be seen about the tenement-houses of Chinatown, each with an infant strapped to her back.

The second class, by far the larger, consists of adult girls. In some instances an opium-smoking father sells his own daughter. For the sake of making an extra hundred dollars he is not careful to stipulate what kind of bondage she shall enter. In the greater number of cases these poor creatures have been decoyed away from their homes or kidnapped during the absence of their parents. Many of these wretched girls are taken down to Hong Kong and exported to Chinese colonies in foreign lands where they bring high prices. In San Francisco they often get past the custom inspectors under the pretense of being the wives of merchants. In some instances they are taken to Victoria, British Columbia, and there, disguised as Lywashee Indian women, they cross Puget Sound into Washington. It must be borne in mind that the girl is a party to the fraud, believing as she does that she is to be the wife of a rich merchant in California.

A Prominent Physician Writes.

SPOTSWOOD, N. J., Aug. 3, 1896.

MESSRS. McKESON & ROBBINS:

Dear Sirs:—Please send me, by mail, four more bottles of Tartarilithine Tablets (100 each.)

I will also here state, in justice, that this is the most welcome remedy that has come into my hands since my beginning of the practice of medicine. It has given me, in every case of rheumatism in which I have used it, the happiest kind of results. I have used discretion, perhaps even more than necessary, in its employment; that it be given to patients whom I believed required such a remedy or preparation; but these are just the kind that refuse to yield to ordinary treatment, old chronic cases of gouty diathesis, where there is a tendency to calcareous deposits, etc. These are undoubtedly, or have been, at least to me, the most troublesome patients in my practice to give what might fairly be termed good results. Now these have been the very kind in which I have been using Tartarilithine with the very happiest results to patients and myself. Many valuable remedies come daily to our aid, but this has been the most welcome one to me thus far.

Yours very truly,

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER

Disintegrates, Breaks Down and Eliminates Stones of the Kidneys or Bladder, Both Uric Acid and Phosphatic Formations.

ANALYSIS AND REPORT OF
DR. R. OGDEN DOREMUS,

Professor of Chemistry in the Bellevue Hospital Medical College, New York.

NEW YORK, Dec. 3d, 1896.
E. C. LAIRD, M. D., Resident Physician, Buffalo Lithia Springs, N. Y.

DEAR DOCTOR:—I have received the five collections of Disintegrated Calculi, each collection containing a number of fragments, and also the three boxes, each containing a single calculus, mentioned in your letter as discharged by different patients under treatment by me.

Spring No. 2.
I have analyzed and photographed parts of each specimen, and designated them alphabetically. One of the Calculi from the collection marked "A," was 3-16 of an inch in diameter, of an orange color, and on section exhibited a nucleus, surrounded by nine concentric layers of a crystalline structure, as shown in the accompanying photograph marked "A," magnified 12 diameters.

(Calculus "A" magnified 12 diameters.)

On chemical analysis it was found to consist of Uric Acid (colored by organic substances from the urine), with traces of Ammonium Urate and Calcium Oxalate.

A fragment of a broken down calculus from the same collection was found to consist of Uric Acid.

(Report as to six specimens of Calculi omitted to economy of space.)

The contents of the boxes marked "C" consist chiefly of whitish crystalline materials.

On microscopic examination they exhibited well defined prismatic crystals characteristic of "Triple Phosphates," as shown in the accompanying photograph "C," magnified 20 diameters.

On chemical analysis they were found to consist of Magnesium and Ammonium Phosphate (Triple Phosphate), Calcium Phosphate, Calcium Carbonate, Sodium and Potassium Salts in traces, Uric Acid and Urates none. Calcium Oxalate none. Organic debris in considerable quantity, and matter foreign to Calculi.

(Collection "C" magnified 20 diameters.)

Yours respectfully,
R. OGDEN DOREMUS

According to distinguished Medical authority Uric Acid Poisoning shows itself in Gout, Rheumatism, Lithæmia, Stone of the Kidney and Bladder, Bright's Disease of the Kidneys, Herpetic Neuralgic Affections, Nervous Prostration, Nervous Irritability, Nervous Asthma, Nervous Headache, cases of Mental Depression and in certain forms of Dyspepsia and Eczema.

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER dissolves and washes out of the system Uric Acid Deposit, and is Nature's own specific for the and all troubles of Uric Acid origin.

Taken as a common Beverage or table water it acts as preventive of Uric Acid deposit and of the distressing maladies caused by such deposit.

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER is for sale by Grocers and Druggists generally. Pamphlets on application.

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION

MODENE

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—In 1890, a mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair had completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. It is perfectly pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It acts mildly and surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT DOES NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the hair grows such as the beard or hair on males may require two or more applications before all roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without skin injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE REMOVES EXCESSIVE HAIR.

Recommended by all who have tested its merits.—Used by people of refinement. Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in MODENE which dissolves away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, the rendering the hair growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who had an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use MODENE to destroy its growth. MODENE sent by mail. In safety mailing cases, postage paid, (see MODENE sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter, with full address written plainly. Correspondence strictly private. Postage stamps receive same as cash. (ALWAYS MENTION YOUR COUNTY AND THIS FACT.) Cut this advertisement to Strange New Shrub that Cures Kidney and Bladder Diseases, Rheumatism, etc. Free.

We have previously described the new botanic discovery, Alkavis, which proves a specific cure for diseases caused by Uric acid in the blood, or disorder of the Kidneys or urinary organs. It is now stated that Alkavis is a product of the well known Kava-Kava Shrub, and is a specific cure for these diseases just as quinine is for malaria. On R. C. Wood, of Lowell, Ind., writes that after four weeks Alkavis cured him of Kidney and bladder disease of ten years' standing, and Rev. Thomas M. Owen, of West Pawlet, Vt., gives similar testimony. Many ladies also testify to its wonderful curative powers in disorders peculiar to womanhood. The only importers of Alkavis so far in the Church Kidney Cure Co., of 418 Fourth Avenue, New York, and they are so anxious to prove its value that for the sake of introduction they will send a free treatment of Alkavis prepaid by mail to every reader of The Christian Herald who is suffering from any form of Kidney or Bladder disorder, Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Gravel, Pain in Back, Female Complaints, or other affliction due to improper action of the Kidneys or Urinary Organs. We advise all sufferers to send their names and address to the company, and receive the Alkavis free. It is sent to you entirely free, to prove its wonderful curative power.

"What I have seen of God's healing power through your demands of me that I speak for the good of others."

D. DR. MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through your demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily.

Spurgeon.

"Westwood," Beulah Hill, England.

Every person suffering from Chest Disease, and all of weak lungs and delicate habit, should read my book on Consumption of the Lungs and Decline, and its successful treatment, showing that formidable disease to be curable in all its stages, with observations on Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis; together with accounts of nearly 400 successfully cured cases, any one of which may be like yours, to be had post free for 25 cts., or the book will be sent free with every first order for $1.00 bottle of Congreve's Balsamic Elixir.

The above letter from the late eminent preacher, C. H. Spurgeon, is one of thousands of testimonials to the wonderful curative properties of my BALSAMIC ELIXIR, which not only cures consumption, but gives instant and permanent relief in cases of Asthma, Chronic Bronchitis, La Grippe and all Chest affections.

It acts like a charm in ordinary cases of Cough, Sore Throat, Whooping Cough, Chills, &c., and should be kept in every home.

SWEET PEAS FOR THE MILLION

AN UNEQUALED OFFER.

In same size packets, the Seven Superb Sweet Peas described below would have cost $3.10 in 1896, but are sold now for only 25 cents.

Incredible as this statement may appear, it is an actual fact. Gray Friar and Ramona, introduced first by us in 1896, sold at 15 cts. per pkt., while HENRY ECKFORD, of England, sold his novelties, Crown Jewel and Little Dorrill, each at 25. 6d. per packet of twenty seeds. As our packets now contain more than forty seeds, these two novelties alone would have cost $1.25 each, if purchased anywhere in 1896.

HEADQUARTERS FOR SWEET PEAS.

We have the largest and finest collection in the world,—see BURPEE'S FARM ANNUAL FOR 1897.

25 Cts. buys these Seven Superb Sweet Peas:

CROWN JEWEL. Pale standards, tinted and veined with violet-rose; the wings are creamy, slightly tinted with rose; a most profuse bloomer.

GRAY FRIAR. Entirely unlike any other Sweet Pea. A most beautiful watered purple on white ground, the heaviest coloring being on the back of standard. The flowers, of hooded form and large size, are borne three and four on a stem.

LITTLE DORRILL. Carmine-tinted pink; standard of finest form, large white wings, slightly tinted, the colors beautifully harmonized; a superbly lovely variety.

METEOR. Truly an exquisite variety. Standards bright orange-salmon, wings delicate pink, with slight veins of purple.

MRS. JOS. CHAMBERLAIN. The flowers are truly enormous, and produced generally three to four on a stem. The color is very effective,—a white ground heavily striped and flaked bright rose; of fine form, very striking.

RAMONA. Grand flowers of very large size and improved hooded form, borne three or four to the stem; color creamy-white, daintily splashed with pink. See BURPEE'S FARM ANNUAL FOR 1897.

"1897" Special Superfine Mixed. This mixture is composed of Twenty-three of the finest New Large-Flowered Sweet Peas. It is a choice blending (each grown separately and mixed by ourselves), which can be easily recognized when in flower.

25 Cts. Buys all the above,—Seven Superb Sweet Peas, each in full-size packet, true to name as described, and mailed, postpaid, to any address.

Any purchaser of two collections for fifty cents can have FREE as a premium one full-size packet either of the new dwarf Sweet Pea, Cupid, or our beautiful novelty for 1897, Aurora,—provided it is stated that the order was sent from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

For ONE DOLLAR we will send five complete collections as above (in all 35 pkts.), and give FREE as a premium one full packet each of CUPID and AURORA,—provided, it is stated where this offer was seen. Please try to get up a club of Five for One Dollar.

Please tell your friends of this great offer, as every one who loves Sweet Peas will want this collection. Any boy or girl can easily sell four collections, and thus get FREE one collection complete, and also one packet each of our remarkable Novelties, AURORA and CUPID.

With every collection we enclose a copy of "How to Grow High-Grade Sweet Peas by the Hamilton Method." In one thousand words it tells plainly just how to succeed in growing to full perfection the finest High-Grade Sweet Peas.

Burpee's 1897 GEM Collection.

"How I MADE ADVERTISING PAY," on page 2 of BURPEE'S FARM ANNUAL FOR 1897, explains our object in offering each season a Special Cheap Collection of the Best FLOWER SEEDS.

The Ten Packets, purchased separately, would cost $1.10, and even if there are some that you cannot use in your own garden, you can afford to give them away, and still have several times the value of the price charged for the entire collection.

For 25 Cts. we will mail to any size packet each of—

ASTERS,—Fordhook Favorites.

An unrivaled mixture of the best Asters, as described on page 100 of BURPEE'S FARM ANNUAL.

BEGONIA,—Vernon.

Grows quickly from seed and makes handsome plants with bronze-tipped leaves and numerous clusters of deep-red flowers. This is famous throughout the world as the best Begonia for bedding and open-ground culture.

CENTAUREA,—New Marguerite.

The illustration and description on page 105 of BURPEE'S FARM ANNUAL FOR 1897 can give but a faint idea of the delicate beauty of this grand, distinct new Centaurea.

DIANTHUS,—Fordhook Favorites.

This mixture is the best ever offered, embracing the finest large-flowered single and the double Chinese and Japanese Pinks.

HOLLYHOCKS,—Fordhook Superb.

This seed is all grown at FORDHOOK FARM, where it has been developed from the finest Chater's Double. The flowers measure three to four inches across, always perfectly double, and embrace a great variety of colors. The long spikes of bloom are magnificent.

MIGNONNETTES,—Fordhook Finest.

Never before has it been possible to secure seed of such grand varieties of Improved Mignonettes, mixed in one packet. Besides other choice varieties, this mixture contains seed of the beautiful New Golden Midget.

PANSY,—Peacock.

In the opinion of many the Peacock Pansy, as now improved, is the most beautiful of all. The iridescent blending of the sea-blue and other colors is almost indescribable.

PETUNIA,—Striped and Blotched.

A fine strain of Petunia hybrida that gives a constant display of bright flowers all summer.

POPPIES,—Fordhook Finest.

This special mixture of the Finest Double Poppies includes Burpee's Fairy Blush, New Pink Pet, Cardinal, Mikado, and Vesuvius.

VERBENA,—Fordhook Famous.

For illustration from a photograph and description of this finest strain of New Mammoth Verbena, see page 123 of BURPEE'S FARM ANNUAL FOR 1897.

TWENTY-FIVE CENTS buys the ten varieties as above, with directions for culture.

For $1.00 we will send Five Gem Collections OR Five Sweet Pea Collections (or of one and three of the other) AND give as a premium one full-size packet each of AURORA and CUPID,—provided, you mention THE CHRISTIAN HER.

SPIKES OF FORDHOOK SUPERB HOLLYHOCKS.

Questions and Answers.

E. M. W., Sandy Lake, Pa. What is the Sabbath Day's journey mentioned in Acts 1:12?

Travel was prohibited on the Sabbath. But as a Jew should obviously attend to his religious duties on that day, the Rabbis fixed a definite limit to his walk. A Sabbath Day's journey must not exceed two thousand yards from his home.

Mrs. M. J. M., Minier, Ill. I am a constant reader of your paper and through its columns I see the notes of the dying and the starving millions in India. I want to ask for some information regarding reaching them with gifts and aid. Please tell me how a carload of grain would be disposed of in order to reach them and what authority or in whose care it should be sent. Give me explicit directions.

As announced in our last week's issue, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has undertaken to forward to India any contributions our readers may make for the famine sufferers. The cablegram received from Lord Elgin, the Viceroy, advised that money, and not grain, be sent and our friends would do wisely to act accordingly. Any grain contributed would have to be sold and millet, wheat, corn, or other cereals bought in the East with the proceeds so as to save the great expense of transportation. It would cost between $20,000 and $30,000 to convey a load of corn from New York to India.

J. A. Peters, Lexington, Ky. Has a man a right to spend his money as he pleases, provided he does not violate the law in doing so? This question came up for discussion among a number of gentlemen here a few evenings ago, and the prevailing view taken was that he had. I questioned the soundness of such a conclusion, however, and suggested that the matter be referred to your MAIL-BAG for adjudication. I may explain that the parties who will look for your answer do not wish to have you decide on Scriptural grounds alone.

There are two answers to your question: 1. Yes; if the owner of the money be wholly selfish and only regards the indulgence of his own wishes and desires, so far as these do not conflict with the laws, he may spend his money as he pleases. 2. No; if he regards his position, duties and responsibilities as a member of civilized society. In such a view, he finds that he has no right to spend it in any manner that may tend to assail the well-being or social and moral order of his fellows, or that may wound their feelings, or pauperize, brutalize, antagonize, or degrade them. In a word, he will find that instead of spending it as he pleases, he will feel obliged to disburse his money in the manner best for society at large, and consequently best for himself as a reputable member thereof. These two conclusions are apart from the Scriptural ground, which is the wisest, and indeed the only true rule for the administration of wealth, and which teaches us that the ownership of money is a stewardship for which its possessor is accountable, and all expenditures should be regulated with the moral and spiritual result in view. Unconsecrated and misspent wealth is a curse; whereas consecrated and wisely employed money blesses all around us.

Young Man, Adams, Ill. I have, what Dr. Talmage, in a recent sermon called military spirit, and wish to enlist in the United States army, but am told the associations are bad. But my inclinations for six years have uncontrollably pointed that way, and I do not care to resist longer. Could it not be a God-sent calling as well as anything else?

Unquestionably it can. One can serve God in the army just as well as anywhere else, as the careers of many heroic Christian soldiers testify. Yet the truth remains that the army and navy are severe tests on a young man's morals, and the associations are not conducive to the upbuilding of character.

Subscriber, Otis, N. Y. Can the true Christian ever be fully lost? Is it not clearly taught that no one who is really Christ's will fall away irreversibly?

That is our hope, and there is ground for cherishing it, but the doctrine does not appear to be clearly taught. There are passages which might seem to bear that interpretation, but there are so many injunctions to watchfulness that there does appear to be a danger of the true Christian backsliding and dying impenitent. No one should allow the belief in final perseverance to make him careless.

S. C. West, Fort Ind. 1. What is the meaning of the word Sabbath? 2. Is it better for the heart the rest of religion?

1. There is a wide diversity of opinion. But the most probable conjecture is that it denotes a period of rest in the vocal or instrumental music. 2. Religion should possess the whole man. He should bring his intelligence to bear upon it, and this is generally understood by the head. But his disposition, his love and kindness and magnanimity, and his passions, which are usually indicated to when the heart is referred to, should be transformed, too. Of course, the fleshly, material heart is not meant. As the heart is the fountain of life, it is an appropriate symbol of the seat of religion, which pervades the whole being.

M. E. C., Tabernacle, N. C. 1. Is it right for a Christian to sell Bibles and religious literature at cost (no commission) on the Sabbath day? 2. Is it the duty of a church member to contribute to the support of a minister whose services he does not appreciate or enjoy?

1. Buying and selling are not proper business for any one professing to be a Christian to engage in on the Lord's day, yet it is supposable that there might be circumstances—which would make such a thing justifiable, as for instance, where an opportunity to disseminate the printed Word occurred unexpectedly. But even in such a case, although the Bibles might be handed over, the commercial part of the transaction should be to cast out an inconsistent member than to help him to reform, but it is better to win him to a consistency by love if it can be done.

Mrs. Sadie C., York, Neb., writes:

I would like to say to Amelia E. Barr that Deborah is called a prophetess in Judges 4:4. A prophetess is a person illuminated, inspired or instructed by God to speak in his name or announce future events. Whether face to face or by dreams they were instructed we know not, but to have the angel of the Lord appear and speak to woman is far above dreams and visions.

To this Mrs. Barr replies as follows:

My article on the "Dream Life of the Bible" is quite apart from the subject of prophecy or prophecies. They would come under a different consideration. Your correspondent cites Deborah. But Deborah did not dream. Deborah saw no vision. She was neither asleep nor yet in that condition of vision which St. Paul defines as neither in the body nor out of it, and which was one at least of absolute insensibility to ordinary life—men in vision were said by Ezekiel and others to be "in the spirit." But Deborah was intensely, consciously, rejoicingly awake. She was singing a song of triumph, possibly playing on the timbrel to it as Miriam did after the passage of the Red Sea. But even in this pious act Barak the son of Abinoam is associated with her. Your correspondent is right in saying that the angelic visitations to women recorded "are far above dreams and visions." They are. But Angelology and Angel Visits was not the subject I was considering. It was only "The Dream Life of the Bible," and in doing this I was compelled by the facts of the case to notice the singular circumstance that men, not women, were the dreamers. But in this statement there is nothing derogatory to women, quite the contrary.

E. M. H., Denrock, Ill. I want to be a Christian, but something holds me back. The more I try to live right, the farther I seem to be from it. What ought I to do?

Many are in the same condition. Even the Apostle Paul seems to have had that experi-not to suppose that he did this without authority. As far as other causes of disagreement between husband and wife are concerned must be left to the individual conscience decide whether they are of a character to make a continuation of the union impossible. They are, undoubtedly, exceptional cases, where every available resort has failed, and where continuance of the existing status might involve the wrecking of two lives and possibly of the of the children also. Separation for a time would seem to be the only remedy available in such distressing cases; but no one holding Scriptural view would counsel divorce, save the grounds already stated.

W. G. Picton Mines, Colo. 1. Were Joseph, Mary the mother of Christ, married before birth of Christ? 2. Did Christ baptize persons himself?

1. Yes. See Matt. 1:18, 19, 24, and para passages. 2. No. See John 4:2.

R. T. Campbell, Ill. A minister was hurriedly called to baptize a child who was very ill, and he baptized it by sprinkling. The parents thought illness was due to the wrath of God at the child not being baptized. Did the parents do right? Did the minister do right?

The parents must have been ill-informed. The child's illness was due to natural cause, not to the wrath of God. The baptism could not do the child any good, physically or spiritually. The minister would probably tell parents so. But in their time of trouble he have yielded to their wish, as it would do child no harm.

C. W. S., Medford, Ont. 1. If Christ died for how is it so many die without ever hearing it? How can the atonement benefit them? What is your belief about the Millennium? Does death end all man's opportunities of salvation or may he have another opportunity beyond the grave?

1. Christ's command was to tell everyone. No blame attaches to him for not hearing of his atonement. The full provision was made, and on his word might come. He died for all, that whoever will, may have salvation. One can easily conceive of a proclamation of emancipation being made, and yet some slaves remaining in slavery because they did not know. The duty enjoined on the Church has not been performed, and so there are many whom Christ's atonement does not benefit, but does not limit the atonement. 2. Christ will reign on the earth for a thousand years, as the Scriptures foretell (See Isa. 65:17-25; Rev. 20:4-6, and other passages). 3. No encouragement is given in the Bible for hope that other opportunity will be afforded, not for us to limit God's mercy. That we know is that it is offered to us in this life, and in terms which appear to imply that the offer is final. Any one who puts off to the future life the acceptance of the offer is running a fearful risk, and one that he is expressly warned against.

J. W. C., Allport, Pa. Did not Christ's command to his followers to be perfect as their Father in heaven was perfect (Matt. 5:48), imply the possibility of their attaining perfection?

He set before them the highest ideal that they might never rest satisfied at lower attainments. Perhaps he feared the danger of people being content with a lower standard, and of even hoping as some do, that they have become perfect. He therefore urged them to strive after absolute perfection, but he did not assure them that they can reach it, nor effort will bring them higher.

Mrs. Peter K., Gasville, O. Who was Mohammed? When and where born?

Mohammed or Ahmad, was born at Mecca, Arabia, A. D. 570 (some say April, 571). His father was Abdallah bin Abdalmottalib, who died before the son was born, and his mother, Aminah. His family was very poor. The legend is known of Mohammed's infancy until 622 (the date of the Hegira), when he fled to Medina.

A STREET SCENE IN GRANTSTOWN, BAHAMAS.

The Bahamas or Lucayas lie in the Atlantic Ocean, between the eastern coast of Florida and the northern coast of San Domingo. They are tropical in the luxuriance of their vegetation. Many varieties of fruit grow wild. The mild climate is believed to be a great advantage to sufferers from pulmonary diseases. These islands are a fine field for missionary effort, and there have been many famous workers for Christ among the natives. Grantstown is on the outskirts of Nassau.

deferred till after Sunday. 2. Giving is a matter of duty, not of whim. If we are of the Church of Christ we should be willing to help to support it. Besides, all have not the same preferences and, what may seem to you to be indifferent, may be the spiritual life of others. To withhold your support of a pastor and continue to claim allegiance to his pastorate is clearly wrong.

H. M. Lewisburg, Pa. 1. Do you think the modern, "up-to-date" church is more effective than the church of our fathers? 2. Do you think the church would be benefited by a wholesale expulsion of inconsistent members?

1. In all points where a church is applying Christianity to modern life, and helping men to resist temptation and lead godly lives, we think it is effective. There is a difference in church as now as there was in the churches of our fathers. There is a tendency now to preach less on doctrine and more on conduct, and so far preaching differs from the preaching of fifty years ago, when election, predestination, and divine sovereignty were frequently the subjects of sermons week after week. Sermons on the symbolism of the Tabernacle and the Temple, and on Jewish laws and customs and types were also in vogue, and they are becoming less common. In all these things the change seems to us a change for the better. 2. Discipline might be beneficial in some instances, but we would rather see reformation without the punishment if it can be secured. It is easier ence (see Romans 7:15-19). He was delivered, as you will see by the closing verse of the chapter, by the power of Christ. We recommend the same power to you. Christ came to impart life, to give power to our weak natures. He still gives that power. If you pray to him and believe that he is able and willing to help you, the help will come. Why should you not trust him? He is full of love and compassion. But if you know what it is that is holding you back, you should give that up. It may be some cherished sin. Pray for enlightenment.

Distressed, Iowa. I noticed your reply to a question about divorce in THE MAIL-BAG some time ago, and I thought it very good, but my case is different. Will you tell me whether I am justified in getting a divorce? My wife claims to be a Christian but she makes my life miserable by persistent and undeserved abuse. I think I could bear that, if it was not for my children (not boys). She insults and abuses them, and that gives me more pain than when she attacks me. For their sake can I not get a divorce?

While incompatibility of temperament is sufficient ground for divorce in law, it is not so regarded in Christian doctrine. In Matt 5:32 and elsewhere, Christ states the only cause which the Christian ought to recognize; but Paul, who probably knew more of Christ's utterances on this important question than the mere fragment that has been preserved to us, takes broader ground, and indicates desertion as a justification (See 1 Cor. 7:15). We are

AN ARMY OF RESCUED CHILDREN.

The Splendid Life-work of Dr. Thomas J. Barnardo Among the Waifs and Strays of England—Over One Hundred Child Institutions Established.

OUR social life at the present day is characterized, in many directions, by widespread benevolent and educational effort in behalf of the neglected classes. Especially is this true of our great cities, whose cosmopolitan populations embrace all degrees and conditions, and where the crowded homes of poverty and the thousands of neglected children appeal strongly to the philanthropic and the kind-hearted. Less than a century ago, the children of poverty were too often left to the rude companionship of the streets, and to grow up to a vicious manhood and womanhood. Now, as this is changed, and society, actuated in some degree by the instinct of self-protection, but in a larger measure by the operation, and to provide a home for the waifs. He rented an old house in Stepney Causeway, London, which was soon transformed into a cheerful and attractive "Home for Destitute Lads," and filled with a number of children gathered in from the dark alleys, railway arches, fruit markets, and river front, where they were surrounded by vicious and criminal associations. From this beginning the rescue work yearly expanded.

At the present time the institutions under Dr. Barnardo's fostering care comprise eighty-five separate Homes and twenty-four Mission Branches. Of these, thirty-four are situated in London, one in the Island of Jersey in the English Channel, seventy in various counties of England, and three in Canada. They include Homes for Working and Destitute Lads, Orphan Homes, Nursery Homes, All-night Refuges, Labor Houses, Village Homes for Orphan and Destitute Girls, Babies' Castles, Hospitals, Servants' Free Registry and Home, Rescue Home for Young Girls in Special Danger, The Bee Hive (an Industrial Home for Older Girls), City Messenger Brigade, Shoeblack Brigade and Home, Wood Chopping Brigade, Convalescent Seaside Homes, Memorial Homes for Incurables, Homes for Girl Waifs, Children's Free Lodging-Houses, Emigration Depots, Industrial Farm and Home, Boarding-out Branches, Blind and Deaf-Mute Branch, Branch for Cripples or Deformed Children, The Children's Fold, Ever-Open Doors (eight Branches of Rescue Work), and several Shipping Agencies for the sending of children abroad.

There is seemingly no limit to the energies and resources of this wonderful Christian worker. So universally trusted and beloved is he by the benevolent people of London and other English cities, that every new project that he proposes for the physical betterment and moral elevation of the wretched poor commands instant attention and support. Up to the present time nearly thirty thousand poor boys have been rescued from privation, suffering and moral peril and a large proportion of them placed in Christian households. He established in different provincial centres, new receiving-houses, with ever-open doors, where application may be made on behalf of desti-

United Kingdom. Deserted children, the progeny of tramps, the orphan children of respectable parents, street arabs, "wharf-rats," motherless girls, cripples (some even legless or armless), little girls rescued from dire moral peril, little sleepers in wagons or alleyways, the blind, deaf and dumb, the hunchback, and every conceivable variety of waifs are all to be found there.

Since 1882 several thousand girls and boys have been sent out in organized parties to Canada, and a large number of young emigrants to Australia and South Africa, from the Barnardo Homes. Many of the children who have been reared in these refuges are now grown men and women, earning an honorable livelihood for themselves in different parts of the world. It is ascertained that over ninety-eight per cent. of all who have been trained in the Barnardo homes and afterward started in life under their auspices, are doing well—some in Canadian homesteads, others on Australian ranches, and still others on their native soil. A number of years ago Dr. Barnardo acquired about nine thousand acres of land near Russell, Manitoba, for the purpose of starting an industrial farm. Buildings were erected and a when the great building was crowded to suffocation by the arabs of the English metropolis. Gospel gatherings and temperance meetings are held there, besides educational classes, mothers' meetings, and bands of hope, and there is a good gymnasium and a tract depot. Another similar Barnardo institute is "Dublin" Castle on the Mile-End Road, London, a famous place for waif rescue and educational work.

teachings of Christianity, is everywhere making an effort to rescue the child-waifs and to save them from the misery and degradation to which they would surely succumb, if no hand of help were stretched toward them.

Our own land shows a steadily increasing number of benevolent institutions for children. In England, one of the great evils that strike at the very root of the vice and misery common to all great cities, is that conducted by Dr. T. J. Barnardo, who has devoted his energies to the care of the homeless and helpless children. So widespread is his charitable projects that he is known throughout England as the "Destitute Children's Friend," and it would be hard indeed to find one more worthy of his title of affectionate admiration.

Thomas J. Barnardo was born in Dublin, Ireland, fifty-one years ago. He was converted in his nineteenth year and he resolved to consecrate himself to the Lord's work in the mission field. He entered London Hospital, in 1866, as a medical student. During the years he spent in capacity, he became acquainted with the poor of the modern Babylon, his duties bringing him much among them. It was long before the thoughtful young student recognized his real field of duty. It was then about twenty years of age, during his medical rounds, visited hundreds of the low East-end lodgings. One bleak winter night he saw no more than seventy-three ragged and homeless children lying under a piece of old paulin at St. Paul's wharf, packed together, big and little, like sardines in a box. Soon became aware that thousands of others were faring just as badly and were being winged up to a godless criminal manhood, they escaped death by starvation or accident meanwhile.

In 1870, Dr. Barnardo made an effort to put his rescue schemes into practical tute children. This was necessary as a considerable proportion of the applicants were from other cities than London, and as they would inevitably drift into the great tribe of hopeless and helpless waifs, were not a rescuing hand held out in time. Every year new branches of the home have been opened, new Lodging Houses, Mission Centres, Messenger Brigades, Coffee Palaces, Free Day Schools and Sunday Bible Schools, Shelters, Creches, Young Helpers' Leagues, and Adult Helpers' Associations, and the work extended widely throughout the number of young lads sent out under the care of a superintendent. The farm now includes about fourteen square miles of the most fertile prairie land in the Dominion. Several hundred young graduates of the home live on it; their conduct has been admirable, and the general prosperity and prospects of the settlement are all that could be desired.

Some of the Barnardo homes are pictured in this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but to give an adequate pictorial presentation would fill the pages of an entire issue. "The Edinburgh Castle," situated in Rhodeswell Road, Limehouse, London, E., is the chief centre of all the evangelistic agencies of the Homes, having sitting accommodations for 3,000, and a gross yearly attendance little short of 300,000. It was formerly a mammoth gin-palace and drinking saloon, and is now a source of Gospel light and educational effort. Our color picture shows the exterior of the castle, on the occasion of the street waifs' supper, reformation that is wrought every year upon many thousands of waifs by means of the Barnardo Homes. Picked up literally in the gutters and the slums, these little outcasts are trained to become godly men and women, skilled in useful trades, and self-respecting and honest. Able Christian men and women are in charge of the different institutions, and all are operated on the plan of a great family with numerous branches. At this moment over 5,000 orphans alone are being sheltered and trained by the Homes. Dr. Barnardo's agents are searching night and day for the little homeless and neglected waifs, and no one who comes under that category is ever refused admission. No gift, patronage, or influence is needed to secure an entrance to the Homes. The industrial, educational, and religious training is thoroughly systematized, and the best results are attained. It is estimated that the annual cost per child for support, shelter, clothing, and all the necessities, is $80. Thousands have already been sent to farm homes in Canada, many to Australia, and other tens of thousands are leading lives of honorable industry in the United Kingdom. Among the various Homes the most interesting, perhaps, is the group which forms the Village Home for Orphan and Destitute Girls, near Ilford, Essex. The Village Home contains at present 52 complete buildings. Of this number 49 are pretty detached Cottages, several containing a family group of from 16 to 20 girls. Each of these small houses is a real and separate home, presided over by a Christian lady, called by the girls "Mother," who devotes all her time and energies to the work. By this means the family system is reproduced in contrast to the barrack or institutional method.

All the Barnardo Homes enjoy the fullest confidence and the most generous support of the British public.

A KING EATING GRASS.

A Sermon by

Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: Dan. 4: 33.

"The same hour was the thing fulfilled upon Nebuchadnezzar: and he was driven from men, and did eat grass as oxen," etc.

BETTER shade your eyes lest they be put out with the splendor of Babylon, as some morning you walk out with Nebuchadnezzar on the suspension bridges which hang from the housetops, and he shows you the vastness of his realm. As the sun kindles the domes with glisters almost insufferable and the great streets thunder up their pomp into the ear of the monarch, and armed towers stand around, adorned with the spoils of conquered empires, Nebuchadnezzar waves his hand above the stupendous scene and exclaims: "Is not this great Babylon, that I have built for the house of the kingdom by the might of my power, and for the honor of my majesty?" But in an instant all that splendor is gone from his vision, for a voice falls from the heaven, saying, "O King Nebuchadnezzar, to thee it is spoken: The kingdom is departed from thee: and they shall drive thee from men, and thy dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field: they shall make thee to eat grass as oxen, and seven years shall pass over thee, until thou know that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will." One hour from the time that he made the boast he is on the way to the fields, a maniac, and rushing into the forests, he becomes one of the beasts, covered with eagles' feathers for protection from the cold, and his nails growing to birds' claws in order that he might dig the earth for roots and climb the trees for nuts.

You see there is a great variety in the Scriptural landscape. In several discourses we have looked at mountains of excellence, but now we look down into a great, dark chasm of wickedness as we come to speak of Nebuchadnezzar. God in his Word sets before us the beauty of self-denial, of sobriety, of devotion, of courage, and then, lest we should not thoroughly understand him, he introduced Daniel and Paul, and Deborah, as illustrations of those virtues. God also speaks to us in his Word as to the hatefulness of pride, of folly, of impiety, and lest we should not thoroughly understand him, introduces Nebuchadnezzar as the impersonation of these forms of depravity. The former style of character is a lighthouse, showing us a way into a safe harbor, and the latter style of character is a black buoy, swinging on the rocks, to show where vessels wreck themselves. Thanks unto God for both the buoy and the lighthouse! The host of Nebuchadnezzar is thundering at the gates of Jerusalem. The crown of that sacred city is struck into the dust by the hand of Babylonish insolence. The vessels of the Temple, which had never been desecrated by profane touch, were ruthlessly seized for sacrilege and transportation. Oh, what a sad hour when those Jews, at the command of the invading army, are obliged to leave the home of their nativity! How their hearts must have been wrung with anguish when, on the day they departed, they heard the trumpets from the top of the Temple announcing the hour for morning sacrifice and saw the smoke of the altars ascending around the holy hill of Zion, for well they knew that in a far distant land they would never hear that trumpet call, nor behold the majestic ascent of the sacrifice. Behold those captives on the road from Jerusalem to Babylon! Worn and weary, they dare not halt, for roundabout are armed men urging them on with hoot, and shout, and blasphemy. Aged men tottered along on their staves, weeping that they could not lay their bones in the sleeping-place of their fathers, and children wondered at the length of the way and sobbed themselves to sleep when the night had fallen. It seemed as if at every step a heart broke. But at a turn of the road Babylon suddenly springs upon the view of the captives, with its gardens and palaces. A shout goes up from the army as they behold their native city, but not one huzzza is heard from the captives. These exiles saw no splendor there, for it was not home. The Euphrates did not have the water- gleam of the brook Kedron or the pool of Siloam. The willows of Babylon, on which they hung their untuned harps, were not as graceful as the trees which at the foot of Mount Moriah seemed to weep at the departed glory of Judah, and all the fragrance that descended from the hanging-gardens upon that great city was not so sweet as one breath of the acacia and frankincense that the high priest kindled in the sanctuary at Jerusalem.

On a certain night a little while after these captives had been brought to his city, Nebuchadnezzar is scared with a night vision. A bad man's pillow is apt to be stuffed with deeds and forebodings which keep talking in the night. He will find that the eagles' down in his pillow will stick him like porcupine quills. The ghosts of old transgressions are sure to wander about in the darkness and beckon and hiss. Yet when the morning came he found that the vision had entirely fled from him. Dreams drop no anchors, and therefore are apt to sail away before we can fasten them. Nebuchadnezzar calls all the wise men of the land into his presence, demanding that by their necromancy they explain his dream. They of course fail. Then their wrathful king issues an edict with as little sense as mercy, ordering the slaying of all the learned men of the country. But Daniel the Prophet comes in with the interpretation just in time to save the wise men and the Jewish captives.

My friends, do you not see that pride and ruin ride in the same saddle? See Nebuchadnezzar on the proudest throne of all the earth, and then see him graze with the sheep and the cattle! Pride is commander, well plumed and caparisoned, but it leads forth a dark and frowning host. The arrows from the Almighty's quiver are apt to strike a man when on the wing. Goliath shakes his great spear in defiance, but the smooth stones from the brook make him stagger and fall like an ox under a butcher's bludgeon. He who is down cannot fall. Vessels scudding under bare poles do not feel the force of the storm, while those with all sails set capsize at the sudden descent of the tempest.

Remember that we can be as proud of our humility as of anything else. Antisthenes walked the streets of Athens with a ragged cloak to demonstrate his humility, but Socrates declared he could see the hypocrisy through the holes in his cloak. We would all see ourselves smaller than we are if we were as philosophic as Seneca the Emperor of Rome who said at the close of his life, "I have been everything, and everything is nothing." And when the urn that was to contain his ashes was, at his command, brought to him he said, "Little urn, thou shalt contain one for whom the world was too little."

Do you not also learn from the misfortune of this king of Babylon what a terrible thing is the loss of reason. There is no calamity that can possibly befall us in this world so great as derangement of intellect: to have the body of man and yet to fall even below the instinct of a brute. In this world of horrible sights, the most horrible is the idiot's stare. In this world of horrible sounds, the most horrible is the maniac's laugh. A vessel driven on the rocks, when hundreds go down never to rise and other hundreds drag their mangled and shivering bodies upon the winter's beach, is nothing compared to the foundering of intellects full of vast hopes and attainments and capacities. Christ's heart went out toward those who were epileptic, falling into the fire, or maniacs cutting themselves among the tombs. We are accustomed to be more grateful for physical health than for the proper working of our mind. We are apt to take it for granted that the intellect which has served us so well, will always be faithful. We forget that an engine of such tremendous power, where the wheels have such vastness of circle and such swiftness of motion, and the least impediment might put it out of gear, can only be kept in proper balance by a Divine hand. No human hand could engineer the train of immortal faculties. How strange it is that our memory, on whose shoulders all the misfortunes and successes and occurrences of a lifetime are placed, should not oftener break down, and that the scales of judgment, which have been weighing so much and so long, should not lose their adjustment, and that fancy, which holds a dangerous wand, should not sometimes maliciously wave it, bringing into the heart forebodings and hallucinations the most appalling! Is it not strange that this mind, which hopes so much in its mighty leaps for the attainment of its objects, should not be dashed to pieces on its disappointments? Though so delicately tuned, this instrument of untold harmony plays on, though fear shakes it and vexations rack it and sorrow and joy and loss and gain in quick succession beat out of it their dirge or toss from it their anthem. At morning and at night, when in your prayer you rehearse the causes of your thanksgiving, next to the salvation by Jesus Christ, praise the Lord for the preservation of your reason.

See also in this story of Nebuchadnezzar the use that God makes of bad men. The actions of the wicked are used as instruments for the punishment of wickedness in others or as the illustration of some principle in the Divine government. Nebuchadnezzar subserved both purposes. Even so I will go back with you to the history of every reprobate that the world has ever seen, and I will show you how to a great extent his wickedness was limited in its destructive power, and how God glorified himself in the overthrow and disgrace of his enemy. Babylon is full of abomination, and wicked Cyrus destroys it. Persia fills the cup of its iniquity, and vile Alexander puts an end to it. Macedon must be chastised, and bloody Emilius does it. The Bastille is to be destroyed, and corrupt Napoleon accomplishes it. Even so selfish and wicked men are often made to accomplish great and glorious purposes. Joseph's brethren were guilty of superlative perfidy and meanness when they sold him into slavery for about seven dollars, yet how they must have been overwhelmed with the truth that God never forsakes the righteous when they saw he had become the Prime Minister of Egypt! Pharaoh oppresses the Israelites with the most diabolic tyranny; yet stand still and see the salvation of God. The plagues descend the locusts, and the hail, and the destroying angel, showing that there is a God who will defend the cause of his people, and finally, after the Israelites have passed through the parted sea, behold, in the wreck of the drowned army, that God's enemies are chaff in a whirlwind! some financial panic the righteous suffer with the wicked. Houses and stores and shops in a night foundered on the rock of bankruptcy, and healthy credit with warning dropped dead in the street, a money ran up the long ladder of twenty-five per cent., to laugh down upon those who could not climb after it. Dealers with pockets full of securities stood shouting in the deaf ears of banks. Men rushed down the streets with protested notes at their heels. Those who before found it hard to spend their money, were left with money to spend. Laborers went home without work, to see hunger in their cheeks at the table and upon the hearth. Wind blew his breath of frost through fingers, and sheriffs with attachments dashed among the cinders of fallen storehouses and whole cities joined in the long funeral procession, marching to the grave of fortunes and a fallen commerce. Verily the righteous suffered with the wicked, but generally the wicked had the worst of it. Splendid estates that had come together through schemes of wickedness were dashed to pieces like a potter's vessel. God wrote with letters of fire, amid ruin and destruction of reputations, estates that were thought impregnable the old-fashioned truth, which centuries ago he wrote in his Bible, "The way of the wicked he turneth upside down," the stars of heaven are reflected from the waters of the earth, even so God's great and magnificent purposes are reflected back from the boiling sea of human passion and turmoil. As the voice of a song uttered among the mountains may be uttered back from the cavernous heart of wild beast and rocks split and thunder scarred, so the great harmonies of God's providence are rung back from the dark caverns of this sin-struck earth. Semiramis, and Abimelech, and Herod, Judas, and Nero, and Nebuchadnezzar, though they struggled like beasts broken to the load, were put into a way where they were compelled to help do ahead God's great projects of mercy.

Again, let us learn the lesson that we can be guilty of polluting the sacred vessels of the Temple and carrying them away to Babylon. The sacred vessels in the Temple at Jerusalem were the cups and plates of gold and silver with which the rites and ceremonies were celebrated, the laying of heathen hands upon them, the carrying them off as spoils was an unbounded offense to the Lord of the Temple. Yet Nebuchadnezzar committed this sacrilege. Though that wicked king is gone, the sins he inaugurated walk and down the earth, cursing it from century to century. The sin of desecrating sacred things is committed by those who on sacramental day take the communion cup, while their conversation and deeds all show that they live down in Babylon. How solemn is the sacrament. It is a time for vows, a time for repentance, a time for faith. Sinai stands up with its fire-split clouds, and Calvary, its Victim. The Holy Spirit broods over the scene, and the glory of heaven seems to gather in the sanctuary. Vile indeed must that man be who will come in with his idols and unrepented follies to hold of the sacred vessels of the temple. O, thou Nebuchadnezzar! Back to you to Babylon!

Those also desecrate sacred things who use the Sabbath for any other than religious purposes. This holy day was set down from heaven amid the intense solemnities of the week to remind us that we are immortal, and to allow us preparation for an endless state of happiness. It is green spot in the hot desert of this world that gushes with fountains and waves with palm trees. This is the time to shake the dust from the robes of our piety and in the tents of Israel sharpen our swords for future conflict. Heaven, that seems so far off on other days, alights upon the earth, and the song of heavenly choirs and the hosannah of the white-robed seem to mingle with our earthly worship. We hear the wailing Infant of Bethlehem, and the hammer-stroke of the carpenter's weary son in Nazareth, and the prayer of Gethsemane, and the bitter cry of Golgotha. Glory be unto the Lord of the Sabbath! With that one day in seven God divides this great sea of business and gaiety, so that dry-shod we may pass between the worldly business of the past and the worldly business of the future!

But to many the Sabbath comes only as a day for neighborhood visiting, field rambling, hotel lounging, and political caucusing. This glorious Sabbath which was intended only as a golden chalice from which the thirsty should drink, is this moment being carried down to Babylon. I do not exaggerate the truth when I say that to tens of thousands there is no distinction between the Sabbath and the week days, except that on the Lord's day they do not work, while they eat more largely and dissipate more thoroughly. Sabbath-breakers are like hunters who should compel their hounds to take rest while themselves continue on the weary chase, for men on the Sabbath allow their bodies which are merely the animal nature, sufficient repose, while their immortal nature, which should be fed and refreshed, is compelled to chase up and down this world's highway. How shameful to rob God of his day, when he allows men so much lawful acquisition, even of a worldly nature, on the Sabbath; for although men themselves are commanded to rest, the corn and the wheat and the grass grow just as rapidly on the Sabbath as on other days, so that while they sit in the sanctuary they are actually becoming richer in worldly things. While you are doing nothing your bonds and mortgages are all accumulating interest for your estate just as fast as on other days. Men hired by the month or year are receiving just as much wages while quiet on the Sabbath as they are the hard-working week-day. How unutterably mean it is, when God is adding to your worldly estate on the Sabbath as certainly as on other days, that any should not be satisfied with that, but attempt to seize additional secular advantage from the Lord's day. Have you never noticed the curious fact that our worldly occupation frequently seems to be divided into sections of six days each? Every week we have just enough work given us to do in six days. God makes just enough breaks in our continuous occupations to thrust in the Sabbath. If you have not before noticed, observe hereafter that when Saturday night comes there is almost always a good stopping-place in your business. All things secular and spiritual in providence and revelation seem to say: "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." When the six days of creation had passed God stopped working. Not even a pure flower or a white cloud would he make, because it was the Sabbath, and giving an example to all future times, he rested.

He who breaks the Sabbath not more certainly robs God than robs himself. Inevitably, continuous desecration of the sacred day ends either in bankruptcy or destroyed health. A great merchant said, "Had it not been for the Sabbath I have no doubt I should have been a maniac long ago." This remark was made in a company of merchants, and one of them said, "That corresponds with the experience of my friend, a great importer. He often said, 'The Sabbath is the best day of the week to plan successful voyages.' He has for years been in an insane hospital, and will probably die there."

Those also repeat the sin of Nebuchadnezzar who in any way desecrate the Holy Scriptures. There are men who use the Word of God as an instrument of angry controversy. Bigots at heart and zealots, in the advocacy of their religious peculiarities they meet other sects with the fury of a highwayman, thrusting them through and through with what they consider the sword of the Spirit. It is a wonder to me that some men were not made with horns to hook with, and hoofs to kick with, and with claws to grab with. What Christ said to rash Peter, when he struck off the ear of Malchus, he says to every controversialist: "Put up again thy sword into its place; for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword."

Rev. William Jay met a countryman who said to him, "I was extremely alarmed this morning, sir. It was very foggy and I was going down to a lonely place and I thought I saw a strange monster. It seemed in motion but I could not discern its form. I did not like to turn back but my heart beat; and the more I looked the more I was afraid. But as I approached I saw it was a man and who do you think it was?" "I know not." "Oh, it was my brother John." Then Mr. Jay remarked, "It was early in the morning and very foggy, and how often do we thus mistake our Christian brethren."

Just in proportion as men are wrong will they be boisterous in their religious contentions. The lamb of religion is always gentle, while there is no lion so fierce as the roaring lion that goes about seeking whom he may devour. Let Gibralters belch their war flame on the sea, and the Dardanelles darken the Hellespont with the smoke of their batteries, but forever and ever let there be good will among those who profess to be subjects of the Gospel of gentleness. "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will to men."

What an embarrassing thing to meet in heaven if we have not settled our controversies on earth. So I give out for all people of all religions to sing, John Fawcett's hymn, in short metre, composed in 1772, but just as appropriate for 1897:

Blest be the tie that binds
Our hearts in Christian love,
The fellowship of kindred minds
Is like to that above.
From sorrow, toil and pain,
And sin we shall be free,
And perfect love and friendship reign
Through all eternity.

Sheltering the Homeless.

Many Hundreds Lodged Nightly at the Salvation Army Headquarters.

DURING the present winter there has been a great deal of suffering among the poor in New York and the general dullness in all branches of trade has swelled the number of idle and homeless men to unusual proportions. Formerly the police stations afforded shelter to a very considerable proportion of the absolutely homeless in severe winter nights, but since this privilege has been discontinued for sanitary reasons, there has been a great increase in the patronage of the City Lodging House, a free public shelter, and also at the cheap lodging-houses along the Bowery and elsewhere. During the recent cold spell, when the keen winds, heavy snows and temperature hovering around zero, drove all the vagrants to seek shelter, the Salvation Army opened its headquarters in West Fourteenth Street to receive them. The place was crowded nightly, from 1200 to 1500 men being accommodated with a place to sleep, and a free supper and breakfast. A part of the headquarters which had been used as a church, was specially devoted to this work, and the auditorium and galleries were crowded nightly with an army of the destitute who slept on its bare wooden floor.

HOMELESS MEN SLEEPING ON THE SALVATION ARMY AUDITORIUM FLOOR, NEW YORK CITY.

glad to find a warm refuge from the arctic blasts that roared outside. Our photographer, in the illustration on this page, taken specially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has shown the scene at the headquarters on a night when almost every available foot of space was occupied by some poor wail of the street.

The Conference of Charities of New York City some time ago appointed a Committee on Vagrancy, to make a special study of the subject of caring for the homeless, and that committee, through its chairman, made a public protest against the method of relief adopted by the Salvation Army in opening its headquarters as a shelter and giving free meals and lodging to large numbers of destitute men. The committee contends that such shelters are dangerous by reason of their liability to spread contagion, and that they are morally degrading and a direct encouragement to vagrancy. It was recommended that the organized charities of the city be permitted to investigate all deserving cases and provide for them. There are doubtless many who reasonably oppose promiscuous charity on these grounds, but the occasion that led to the opening of the Salvation Army headquarters was in the nature of an emergency such as fortunately seldom occurs. As soon as the cold wave passed, the shelter was closed.

The Champion Sunday Scholar

More Claimants for the Honor of the Longest Continuous Attendance.

MANY letters have been received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with reference to the article it lately published concerning the championship claim of John C. Eastland, Jr., of Danville, Ky., for the longest continuous attendance at Sunday School. Some of the records mentioned in these letters are far below that of young Eastland, George Currin, Theodore Reuter and Lena Reuter, who were mentioned in the first stage of this interesting competition. We make the following extracts from several letters, believing that the subject is one that interests a very large number of our readers. Mr. George H. Grove, 3842 Aspen street, Philadelphia, writes:

I notice in your issue of this week an article in reference to John C. Eastland, of Danville, Ky., having the championship record for attendance at Sunday School, and as you have requested Superintendents or others who know of any scholars who can surpass this record to communicate with you, I give you the following facts in reference to some scholars in the school of which I am the superintendent. In the Sunday School of the Third Christian Church, Lancaster avenue and Aspen street, West Philadelphia, are three brothers, Harry, Bruce and Philip Fetter, of 6010 Lansdowne avenue, who have been regular attendants in this school every Sunday in the year for eleven consecutive years, or in other words were present 572 regular sessions of the school, as well as all special meetings. The boys live about three miles from the school and invariably walk both ways. They began the twelfth year, by all three confessing the Lord Jesus as their Saviour, and becoming enrolled as members of the church. While there may be some schools that can show a better individual record, I do not believe there can be shown as good a one by the same number from one family.

Rev. T. A. Nelson, of Brooklyn, N. Y., writes:

You report in a recent issue of your paper the circumstance of a Sabbath School scholar who has achieved the enviable record of being present at every session of her Sabbath School for the last eight years, and you challenge anyone to report an equal record. I have great pleasure in stating that the Sabbath School of the church I serve as minister, The Memorial Presbyterian Church of Brooklyn, N. Y., has among its scholars, a young lady, Miss Belle Thorne, who has never missed a session of our Sabbath School in over twelve (12) years. Just put her name at the head of your honor roll.

Mr. Charles M. Atwood, Albany, N. Y., writes:

I have a boy in my class, Robert Patterson, by name, who has not missed one Sunday since the organization of the school, ten years and two months ago, so you see the Madison avenue Presbyterian Sunday School claims the champion.

Miss Topping, another reader of this journal, writes:

Harry Rhame, of East Rockaway, Long Island, has not missed one Sunday in four years attending the Sunday School in this place. He was eleven years old last 4th of July, and has often denied himself going to places for the sake of going to Sunday School, and better than all, he did it for no prize, as none was offered or given, but the Junior Society of which he is a member, is going to present him next Friday (5th of February), with a book as a recognition of his faithful attendance, and this will be a surprise to him.

As the competition now stands, it has been deemed advisable to divide the competitors into two classes, and to allow the girls and boys an equal chance. The following is the state of the poll:

Boys	Attendances	Yrs.	Weeks
George Currin...	613	11	41
Harry Fetter...	572	11
Bruce Fetter...	572	11
Philip Fetter...	572	11
Theodore Reuter...	544	10	24
R. Patterson...	528	10	8
J. C. Eastland, Jr.	507	9	30
Harry Rhame...	208	4
Girls	Attendances	Yrs.	Weeks
Belle Thorne...	624	12
Lena Reuter...	544	10	24

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will award at the close of this friendly competition, handsome prizes to the boy and girl showing the largest number of consecutive Sunday School attendances, and also to the boy and girl having the next highest record of consecutive attendances on either list—four prizes in all. It is especially requested that Superintendents and teachers should forward to us the names and records of the pupils in their respective schools who, in their judgment, are entitled to be entered as competitors. It is not the largest number of attendances, but the highest number of consecutive attendances, that will be accepted as the qualification.

A FAMOUS CHURCH-BUILDER.

Rev. Henry Martin Ladd of Cleveland and His Remarkable Career—The Church Militant and Progressive Illustrated in Actual Life.

THE growth of Christianity can be measured by the increase of churches which, like milestones along the path of civilization, mark the progress of the world toward that millennium, when all shall see and know the light. Throughout the length and breadth of our Union, schools, colleges, and churches dot the landscape and give promise of a closer fellowship among the sons of men, and a strengthening of that bond which impels a man to follow the golden rule, and "do as he would be done by."

Dr. Cyrus Hamlin, who is known to the world as the builder of Robert College on the Bosphorus, a man who comes from the sturdy stock that helps to make the history of nations, was once called to the Presidency of an American college, which for a hundred years has nestled down among the Green Mountains.

Dr. Hamlin was a man who made companions of the students, joining them in their sports and ever ready with jest or anecdote "to point a moral or adorn a tale." Strolling about the campus one evening at the sunset hour, he told a story of a pioneer missionary family in Turkey, the name of which will be familiar to all Congregationalists of the older generation, that of the Rev. Martin Ladd. "There was a little boy in the family," said Dr. Hamlin, in telling the story, "a little boy named Henry, and Henry was troubled with some infantile disorder which provoked the most dreadful wailings at just those particular hours of the night when I was most engrossed in developing plans for Robert College. I used to pray that an all-wise Providence would deem it fitting to call that child to a higher, happier home, but I have lived to see him and his class right here in these old halls, and I have seen him take a first prize in his post-graduate course at Yale, and now he is building churches."

The gentleman of whom he was speaking was the Rev. Henry Martin Ladd of Cleveland, Ohio, who was until recently the youngest Doctor of Divinity in this country. He came to America in boyhood, and after a course at Middlebury, Vt., took up a theological post-graduate course at Yale, graduating with honors. His first call was to the First Congregational Church at Walton, N. Y. From this charge he was called to go as foreign superintendent of missions to Africa, under the direction of the American Missionary Association. One journey was made to the west coast of Africa to inspect mission stations there, and another most hazardous journey was made to Central Africa near the head waters of the Nile, where he met and knew Emin Bey, at that time the ruling spirit of that section. This undertaking, because of the insurrection of the Mahdi, led to a temporary abandonment of the project for founding missions in that region, and a call to the Euclid Avenue Congregational Church in Cleveland opened a field for labor which has grown and prospered and been greatly blessed in the ingathering of many precious souls. The little brick church with its charter membership of nineteen in 1843, had grown, until in 1866 with a membership of 100, it was judged timely to erect a more fitting edifice. To this church came the present pastor, fresh from his African experiences, equipped with a keen and far-seeing knowledge of men and affairs, and full of a holy zeal for Christian service. His first decided move was to replace the old church by one suited to the needs of his people. At the rate of more than one a year, sixteen churches had sprung up, modern in structure, within a radius of less than a mile. The doubting ones shook their heads, but roused by the vigor and determination of the new pastor, they were soon among the most active, not only in working, but in giving.

EUCLID AVENUE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, CLEVELAND.

The church was built of solid stone, even to the apex of the imposing towers. "It shall be good enough for the rich man and not too good for the poor man," said the pastor, and the result was a substantial pile, rich in its simplicity, thoroughly genuine in all details, finished in antique oak even to the lofty ceiling. Everything seemed to favor, and at a cost of $35,000 a building was reared to the service of God, which could not be duplicated for $75,000. A large debt had been prophesied, but on the day of dedication no word was spoken of money, for the church was free from debt.

The works of arts in the casements, the memorial windows, the carved stone baptismal font, the comfortable chairs, the homelike attractiveness were all appreciated. Better still the spirit of Christ was in the church, and it grew as never before, and the Sunday School overflowed even the spacious accommodations which had been provided. This growth was largely due to the fact, that Christian harmony and unanimity of feeling had prevailed through all the seasons of church building.

While some churches are contented with the eloquence of a pastor, others pride themselves upon the magnitude of their charities. Still another class is chiefly engaged in the extension of church work. The Euclid Avenue Church achieved a happy combination of all these functions in the spreading of the Gospel. The Madison Avenue Church was the first to spring up as an offshoot of the parent church and a chapel was erected in 1875. The first pastor, Rev. O. D. Fisher, was succeeded by a fellow student of Dr. Ladd, and the work of the church has been mainly directed to the laboring class, its location being especially favorable.

Then followed the Reservoir Sabbath School which was but the seed for the uprising of the Park Church. The establishment of branches in no way impoverished the parent church. On the contrary, the roll of membership continued to lengthen. Hough Avenue Church followed. Many said when it was proposed to establish a mission in that quarter: "What do you want or expect from a church among cornfields? There is nothing there and there never will be." The Sunday School was started, however, the seed was sown and the city drifted toward it as anticipated. Then came the enthusiasm, the desire for a modern and comfortable church, and then the present structure.

The Lake View Church, the neat and attractive chapel of which, was built from Mr. Ladd's own drawings, is of still more recent birth. Over nine hundred persons have been received into the church by Dr. Ladd. Over one hundred were granted letters of dismission in a single year, to form one of the new churches, and over fifty to form another, and yet at the end of the year the membership of the present church was larger than at the beginning. The rapidity with which these branches have built their churches, and freed themselves from debt is a moral lesson to the churches throughout the land, proving that the populous city is a rich field for Christian labor. There is no reason why the Word of God should be dispensed to chilly listeners or to people stifled by an impure atmosphere. Physical suffering is not a necessity for spiritual upbuilding. When the wail and estray learns that religion does not mean a long face and constant self-denial, the first step has been taken toward the regeneration of his heart, and the wail and estray abides in the habitations of the rich as well as in the hovels of the poor. Dr. Ladd has fully realized this fact, and has been an aggressive organizer. The church militant has planted its banner upon every available acre, and those who have gathered there have rallied round it as around a standard. So will perseverance, push and energy achieve success when prompted by the love of God and the desire to benefit mankind.

The chime of a distant bell calling a band of worshippers to prayer, may turn the tide of a life to a noble ending, and if but one single soul, one brand plucked from the burning, should be the record, the churches of a city have not been built in vain.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

THE RESURRECTED LORD.

Suggestions on the Epworth League Topic for Feb. 28, Isa. 25 : 6-8.

THE world has always cherished the idea of a coming golden age, and has indulged the hope that a better time than any we have seen awaits the human race. The prophet's imagery veils the joys of that time in physical gratification. Rich food, and wines which have absorbed the lees, or juices of the grape and have afterwards been run through a strainer to refine them, so that they have the essence of the fruit without any impurity, are the images he employs. God's people are to feast on these things. It is of course a figure only. It represents the gratification and the sufficiency which God will provide for his people. There is to be enlightenment, too; the covering which now intervenes between God and his people is to be removed and we shall no longer see him only as in a mirror, darkly. The veil will be taken away and we shall know him in all his glorious beauty. All that men dread and suffer will also be banished, tears will be wiped away for there will be nothing to weep over; and death, the final catastrophe of every life will be destroyed and for all this the word of the Lord is pledged. When we think of the resurrection, we realize how these blessings are to reach the human race. Christ has gone before us into the unseen, victorious over death and the grave to claim his reward and to receive those blessings for his people. In his resurrection we have the pledge of future possession. Had he remained in the grave we should have always had the paralyzing doubt whether he was different essentially from ourselves, and whether he had the power to fulfil his promises. But death after it had seized him, yielded to his power. Subdued under him, its shackles torn asunder, it is a beaten enemy. Its crown is wrested from its brows; it has no dominion over him. He has gone above to receive gifts for men and to assure them a share in his spoils.

A Madagascar Exploration.

PRINCE Henri, of Orleans, who has recently returned to France from an exploring trip in Madagascar, has made an interesting record of his journeyings. He disembarked at Tamatave, pushed on to Tananarivo, and descended to Majunga. And from Mayotte, on September 1, 1894, he sent to the Revue de Paris an interesting article describing his journey across the island. The route they took to Antananarivo, the capital, was not the beaten track, but a mere path. For three days they kept parallel to the coast and then struck into the mountain and forest path with a clay soil the color of brick. Climbing was hard work. The clay was so slippery that when a path descended they had to advance in crab fashion on all fours. There was no game except black parrots. They heard the chattering of apes, which remained hidden in their leafy retreats. Fern trees were common and grew in fantastic shapes, and orchids flourished everywhere. It was a great relief to get to the tableland, which is a rolling country, formed by low hills covered with grass. The travellers spent a night in a fishing village on the shore of Lake Aluotra, which is twenty-five miles long and six broad. They longed to bathe, but were told that the lake was alive with alligators, which, however, did not seem a check on the increase of widgeon, teal, wild duck and crested heron, with which the surface of the water and the shores are alive. The principal aquatic plant is a species of water-lily with a blue flower. The sun sets over this calm lake were glorious and romantic. Everything on earth looked strange; the sky was pale green, with narrow strips of black cloud. The travellers determined to explore a mountainous country to the left, which is a blank on the maps. They had to go without guides, and the forest had no paths but the tracks of wild boars. However, they were checked by a morass, and in returning, lost their way, but the chief of a village on which they came entertained them hospitably with honey and wild ducks stewed with rice.

The value of the scientific discoveries Prince Henri made can hardly be estimated. French and English scientific societies have recorded their high appreciation of the scientific work accomplished by the noble explorer.

TO FEED STARVING INDIA.

Five Thousand Dollars Advanced by "The Christian Herald" to Ten Missionaries for Relief Work Among the Sufferers—Progress of the Fund.

THE latest cable reports from India show increased mortality and suffering in the famine and plague-stricken districts. In view of the extreme urgency of the crisis, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has this week forwarded by cable, through the Mission Boards, the sum of five thousand dollars to be distributed in relief at concerning which, reliable information has been received here. This sum is advanced by the proprietor of this journal in anticipation of the relief contributions, and with the full conviction that his action will find a ready and spontaneous endorsement from those readers who are contributing to the fund. The ten centres to which this initial remittance from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD India Relief Fund was sent are as follows:

Location.	Missionary Distributor.	Amount Sent.
Bombay.	Bishop J. M. Thoburn.	$500
Lucknow.	Rev. E. W. Parker.	500
Bhyulla, Bombay.	Rev. Edward S. Hume.	500
Ahmednagar.	Rev. James Smith.	500
Surat, Poona.	Rev. Richard Winsor.	500
Colapur.	Rev. Robert Wilder.	500
Patalgarh.	Rev. John N. Forman.	500
Nadur.	Rev. T. S. Taylor.	500
Mayagiri.	Rev. W. R. Manley.	500
Madiana.	Rev. C. B. Newton.	500

Total, $5,000

These are all American missionaries and represent the Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian, and Congregational denominations. The need of this prompt remittance was abundantly clear. Every day's delay involved death to thousands who might be kept alive. From our own correspondent in the field, from the missionaries, and from government officials, the same story has been coming of men, women, and children pleading for food, and falling dead in the roads when no food was at hand to give them. Many of these have a special claim on Christian benevolence, having accepted Christianity and thus cut themselves off from the charity of their Hindoo fellow-countrymen. The following is only one of many urgent appeals which emphasize this strong plea for help. It comes from Rev. William Hinckley, of Anantapur, in Southern India, who writes "All grains and food-stuffs have risen to three times their usual price, while all cultivation on which thousands are dependent, has ceased; so that there has been practically no wages earned, while hunger and thirst have been as constant as ever. Thus a large number of our Christians, being of the poorer class, have, like others, been reduced to taking a single meal a day, consisting of a coarse grain such as a European gives his horse. "This is the condition to which we have gradually come in the last three months. Government has already opened several relief works, and will thus save many from actual starvation; but as the nearest of these is eighteen miles distant they are of no advantage to us.

"In such a calamity, as I daily listen to the appeals of those whom I am almost helpless to aid—those who are trying against such odds to believe that 'God is Love'—the one duty which presses upon me is that of making the facts known to any who, by the contribution of a small coin can relieve the distress, but especially to those fellow Christians who, in God's good providence, enjoy the benefits of civilization, who are never likely to know, as they never have known, what it is to be deprived of daily food, and whose high hope in life as in death, is to win the approval of Him who said: 'I was an hungered and ye fed me; Inasmuch as ye did it unto them ye did it unto me.'"

The government now admits how vast the problem is. One of the highest officials, in a plain statistical statement, declared that the area in the grasp of the famine was 164,000 square miles in extent, with a population of thirty-six millions, while, bordering upon it, was an area in which great scarcity prevailed, and this area included 121,000 square miles, with a population of forty-four millions. Thus a population of eighty million persons is suffering, in greater or less degree, the pangs of hunger. This is a larger area and a more numerous population than in the famine of 1877. Happily the means of coping with the problem are also more efficient. The railways have been opened in all directions and have done much to break the isolation of rural India. The system of relief works is also better organized than in 1877. According to the latest cable reports nearly three million persons were being employed on these works, but even this immense number represents only a fraction of the vast host of sufferers. Nor does the statement of the death-rate show the actual mortality caused by the famine.

Our Own Correspondent, who has been on a six weeks' journey through the famine districts, writes that "the subordinate native agency to whom the registration of births and deaths is necessarily intrusted, never thinks of setting down starvation as a cause of death. They look for symptoms of a recognized disease, and as fever or dysentery nearly always precedes these deaths from the famine, they simply reported an epidemic of those diseases. So it came about that the central government did not appreciate the gravity of the crisis, nor begin to move in earnest to relieve the famine until it had the vast area wholly in its grip." Mr. Aitken adds that "The people on the Re-three thousand persons for two weeks. We hope that by the end of that time another remittance may be sent to enable them to continue the beneficent work. The missionaries being in the centre of the famine-stricken districts are only too glad to undertake this work of distribution gratuitously so that every dollar contributed goes intact to the sufferers, with no deduction for cost of administration. Every contributor to the fund may, therefore, have the satisfaction of knowing that each dollar he gives will be spent in food, and in food only. As one cent a day is sufficient to support life, it follows that with one dollar given at this time one person may be kept alive until the beginning of June, when some relief to the appalling suffering may be expected.

The Plague

continues its ravages in Bombay. Official returns place the figures at the close of January at 3,759 cases, and 2,708 deaths. The city has a deserted appearance owing to the closing of many of the stores and offices. The majority of the native physicians have fled, and of those remaining any who are summoned to a case of plague are careful not to touch the patient, or to remain long in his vicinity. Clerks and others whose duties require their presence in the city, have established stations of thatched huts at a distance of about forty miles and go to and fro in the morning and evening. At Andheri about eight thousand persons are encamped in huts. Already refugees from Bombay have carlief Works are increasing at the rate of a hundred thousand a week, which is a sure indication that the suffering is spreading rapidly, and the small stocks of grain are being exhausted.

SCENE AT A RESIDENCY AFTER THE ARRIVAL OF GRAIN FOR DISTRIBUTION.

"It is at the end of February and the beginning of March when the supreme crisis will be felt, and the time to which the Government looks forward with apprehension. That is the time when the winter crops should begin to be harvested in many parts; and this year there will be no crops to harvest." In view of this report, the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD felt that it was imperative to make an early remittance that the missionaries might have time to secure supplies of food in their districts before the inevitable increase in the demand came. The amount sent will, it is estimated, enable each of the ten missionaries to give one meal a day to about ried the plague to Poona, where many deaths have occurred. All the authorities agree that the disease is the direct consequence of the famine, and that if the people continue to eat the roots and rubbish, the plague will continue to spread.

Poorly-fed Ministers.

ONE reason why ministers do not preach with more animation, is because thousands of them are kept on a low diet through the parsimony and meanness of their congregations. I, who have more than enough, can say it without embarrassment. Considering the amount of work they do, the clergymen of America are more poorly paid than any other class of laborers. Mechanics strike when they have to work over eight hours a day. Many of the clergymen that I know work fourteen hours a day. Railroad engineers, bricklayers, plumbers, carpenters, and masons strike because of the smallness of their wages. The ministers of America average less than four hundred dollars a year salary. When a friend sent an extra contribution to one of our western missionaries, the missionary returned a letter of thanks, saying that they had through that donation meat on their table the first time in three months, and that the children had been compelled to wear their summer clothes all of the previous winter.

One reason why the apostles preached so powerfully was that they had healthy food. Fish was cheap along Galilee, and this and unbolted bread gave them plenty of phosphorus for brain food. These early ministers were never invited out to late suppers, with chicken salad and doughnuts. Nobody ever embroidered slippers for the big foot of Simon Peter, the fisherman preacher. Tea parties, with hot waffles at ten o'clock at night, make namby-pamby ministers; but good hours and substantial diet, that furnish nitrates for the muscle and phosphates for the brain and carbonates for the whole frame, prepare a man for effective work. When the water is low the mill-wheel goes slowly, but a full race, and how fast the grists are ground! In a man, the arteries are the mill-race, and the brain is the wheel, and the practical work of life is the grist ground. The reason soldiers failed in some battles was because their stomachs had for several days been innocent of everything but "hard-tack." See that your ministers all over the land have full haversacks. Feed them on gruel during the week, and on Sunday their sermons will be gruel. What is called the parson's nose in a turkey or fowl, is an allegory, setting forth that in many communities the minister comes out behind.

Six or eight hundred dollars a year for a minister is only a slow way of killing him, and is the worst style of homicide. The damage begins in the college boarding-house. The theological student has generally small means, and he must go to a cheap boarding-house. A frail piece of sausage trying to swim across a river of gravy on a breakfast plate, but drowned at last: "the linked sweetness long drawn out" of flies in the molasses cup; the gristle of a tough ox and measly biscuit and buckwheat-cakes, tough as the cook's apron, and old peas in which the enclosed insects lost their life before they had time to escape from the sauce-pan, and stale cucumbers cut up into small slices of cholera-morbus, are the provender out of which we are trying at Princeton and Yale and New Brunswick to make sons of thunder. Sons of mush! From such depletion we step gasping into the pulpit, and look so heavenly pale that the mothers in Israel are afraid we will evaporate before we get through our first sermon.

Tired of Life.

DURING the last few months there have been an unusual number of those who have proclaimed themselves tired of life, and therefore by their own violence have quit it, some by pistol, and some by halter, and some by poniard, and some by leap from high window sill. The number of suicides multiplies. It is a consequence of the infidelity of the day. People have an idea if they get out of the troubles of this life they are out of trouble forever. If all the region outside this world is a safe landing-place, why not jump off? Christianity teaches us that in our future destiny much depends upon the way of going out of this life, and that the poorest way of getting out of trouble is suicide. No man who believes in the Bible will take his own life, unless under temporary or permanent insanity, in which case he is not responsible. Why should men be tired of life when there are so many modes of alleviating their condition? The grandest of all condolences is Christian condolence. There is a balm for all wounds, and a light for all darkness. The ruggedness of the earthly path, if rightly traveled, will make all the brighter the terminus. But it is no wonder that men with no supernatural assistance utterly lose patience with their earthly condition. Tired of life! And yet how short it is,—the flight of a shuttle! Can we not bear up under its ills, when the story will soon be over? In contrast with the millenniums of eternal joy, how insignificant the brevity of our earthly residence! The sharp winter weather drives some of these poor creatures off the edge of life. It is dreadful to be cold,—cold all day and cold all night. Cold is death. May there be more blankets on the poor man's cot and more fuel for the hearth, and let us do all we can to relieve the condition of those who are tired of life.

Too Much Love.

AGAIN diphtheria and scarlet fever are busy in the nurseries. May God pity the broken hearts! I scout the idea so often advanced that you must not love your children too much. That is impossible. I declare the more you love them the better. You cannot love them enough. But along with this intense affection we must culture the feeling that they are the Lord's, and when he takes them it is only to make us more anxious for heaven, the blessed destiny which I hope awaits everyone of us. Meanwhile, I suppose those two scourges of the cradle will go on with their awful work. The doctors fail in combating them as much now as thirty years ago. Scarlet fever, with its fiery suffering, and diphtheria, that in other days was called putrid sore throat, keep straight on mowing down the rising generations of the world. Disease let loose six thousand years ago cannot be curbed, or chained, or slain. It is the way by which the world is cleared for other populations. But it makes little difference by what kind of ailment we go out of this world, if we meet with the right kind of reception in the next.

"He Watereth the Hills From His Chambers."

RAIN is the most fascinating phenomenon in the universe. It is thawed for us out of Polar icebergs, and sucked up by lotus flowers in tropical forests. The sea is ever laboring for the land; the billow and the furrow have a constant trafficking through the ministry of the clouds, while the sun unceasingly turns water into vapor, so that it may be light enough to be carried through the air. From the Mediterranean, Dr. Halley calculated, it brews during twelve hours of a summer's day, five thousand two hundred and eighty millions of tons; and Dr. Watson estimates that from an acre of ordinary ground in the same time, two thousand gallons are taken. Vegetables constantly discharge vapor, and every human being in hot weather contributes daily nearly five pounds—a quantity which if it were visible would cause us all to appear in a little cloud.

Yet all this immense store of watery vapor would not benefit the farmer unless God had made provision for carrying it where it was needed. So he has ordained currents of air, whose explicit business it is to take up cargoes of vapor at the great ocean tanks, and hasten with them into the heart of the country, and this is so surely and constantly done that no train, starting with its load of passengers and freight to a given point, is more sure of its work and destination. Filled far out on the ocean, by invisible hands, the clouds catch the wind and make for the shore, delivering their precious freight over cities, plains, and mountain slopes. If too much is given, it is carried back to the sea, and anon returns, with a generous obstinacy, on its gracious duty.

When the atmosphere is of high temperature it will hold a great deal of vapor; but colder streams of air continually invade it, and the vapor thus condensed by cold becomes a cloud. Every one must have watched clouds forming in this way in a clear sky, and felt something of the adoration which a visible act of creation would evoke. Generally this miracle is worked from two to three miles above the farmer's head; but the clouds do not stay there; many things combine to win their watery treasures from them—chillier tracts of sky—an atmosphere too full of vapor to bear more accessions—or the persuasion of mountains and woods; then the floating clouds descend as fog, or rain, hail, or snow.

And how wonderfully they descend! Not in torrents and floods, sweeping all before them, but trickling through the air in drops, and falling so gently on the earth that not a blade of grass or the petal of a flower is injured. Slowly sailing over field after field, leaving no part unwetted, they come, as God's blessings always come, as if they love to be compelled to bless. In tropical lands, where the sun brews vapor in enormous quantities, a shower is a more emphatic thing; but such rains have a local need and significance, and are as necessary as our more temperate falls.

For thousands of years these gigantic waterworks of nature have never been at fault, and never out of order. Whole lakes are annually hoisted into the upper air, and then lowered with such exquisite precision that seed-time and harvest never fail. Neither is this their only duty. In their descent, they purify the atmosphere as well as the earth; for water is the life-blood of the world, and its active circulation as necessary to the health of the planet as is the steady flow of blood in our own veins necessary to our life. "All the rivers run into the sea, the sun lifts them into the firmament, from whence they return to the earth loaded with blessings; from the place whence the rivers came, thither they return again."

We know that mist and fog are deadly magazines of sheathed electricity—that the gazes of the sea released from their combinations would produce intensest flame; that the atmospheric elements transformed, would poison and suffocate everything that breathes; that the clouds unrestrained would sweep us away with a flood—that the winds not held in his hand would take us off in a hurricane;—yes, that if the ties of chemical affinity were relaxed, the globe itself would crumble. But we also know that God holds the winds and waters in the hollow of his hand; that he hides the thunderbolts in drifting vapor; that in all ages he is the Preserver of men, and that he makes all things work together for our safety and good.

Lord we are thine, and thou art ours;
Thine, too, are sun and rain;
And thou, for us, their varying powers
Wilt heighten or restrain.
Then be the weather what it will,
We trustfully will serve thee still.

BRIEF NOTES.

A Free Kindergarten has been opened in the Bowery Mission for the benefit of the neglected children of the East side. Miss Ruby M. Hoge, who now conducts the Sewing Classes at the Mission, is in charge. Any one interested in this work and desiring to aid in its support, either by contributions of money or kindergarten material, can do so by addressing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City.

Elder James Archer, of Greenwood, Stanton P. O. Miss., would be glad to receive religious books or periodicals to distribute among the poor of his section. Both the white and colored people need them badly.

The latest statistics of Christian Endeavor give the following figures: Total number of societies, 47,279; total of members, 2,836,740. Of the societies 47,113 are in the United States and the rest in Canada and foreign lands.

The effect of over-crowding on the death rate was shown in a recent report of a London vestry. The death rate for the whole of London was eighteen per thousand, for the Kensington district sixteen per thousand, but for the "slum" area it was fifty per thousand.

Evangelist C. H. Vatman writes that he had a glorious soul-saving time at Drogheda, Ireland. Thence he was going to Belfast, where the largest hall in the city had been secured for him. He expects to return to America early next month and will begin work at Elkhart, Ind.

The annual report of the George Junior Republic at Freeville, N. Y., shows that two hundred young people were on the settlement during the summer. The average cost per citizen was $1.38 a week. By the gifts of Mr. John D. Rockefeller and others Mr. George has been enabled to purchase a farm of forty-eight acres and erect a building.

Pastors Henry Lenz and Rev. Mr. Teller, of Crystal Lake, Ill., have been holding meetings with the employees of the Knickerbocker Ice Company this month. The company employs about three hundred men at Crystal Lake during the season and freely gave permission for the evangelistic services.

In the little German principality of Waldeck a decree has been proclaimed that a license to marry will not be granted to any individual who has the habit of getting drunk, and if one who has been a drunkard applies for such license he must produce sufficient proof of reformation to warrant his receiving it.

The Philadelphia Missionary Council has received the sad news of the death of the Rev. I. Cameron Scott, of Brooklyn, N. Y., founder and director of the Africa Inland Mission in Nzwabishi, East Africa, on December 4. Mr. Scott was one of the youngest and most active missionaries in the field, being only twenty-nine years old.

The Silver Wedding of the McAll Mission in Paris was celebrated January 17. The work still extending. A new hall has been opened in Rue Championnet, the Gospel Boat has been doing good work at Melun, Hericy and other places. Missions have been opened at Cannes, Grass, Nice, Nantes and at Ajaccio in Corsica.

At a grand Field Council of the Volunteers held last week under the presidency of Commissioner Ballington Booth, it was decided to organize a committee for the examination of candidates for the ministry. Mrs. Booth and several members of the Volunteers are to be ordained immediately. They will thus have the right to perform all rites and ceremonies including matrimony.

An authority on missionary work, reviewing the position at the beginning of this year, says that twelve missionary societies of five denominations have a total indebtedness of $1,013,632, and that total would have been larger by three-quarters of a million but for severe retrenchment, which must have greatly limited and crippled their work.

Mr. Ira D. Sankey held an enormous audience spellbound in Chicago on February 4th. The meeting was in Association Auditorium which crowded in every part. Mr. Sankey gave an address interspersed with Gospel solos. Many of the audience were in tears as he told the story of his friend Mr. P. P. Bliss. At the request of persons in the audience Mr. Sankey sang several favorite hymns. His visit will be one long remembered in the city.

Dr. L. W. Munhall preached on January 7 in the Grand Opera House, Salt Lake City, Utah. The great building was crowded in every part. The subject of his discourse was personal purity. The Salt Lake Tribune, which reports his sermon, says that the preacher made a tour of the city the previous evening and saw the kind of places that were doing a flourishing business. He expressed great indignation at seeing that these same resorts were running at full blast on Sunday.

A new Sisterhood has been started in Brooklyn for the benefit of the sick poor. It is known as the Christian Helpers. The first members are seven ladies connected with Christ Episcopal Church. For the first three months they will attend daily lectures under the guidance of a physician and trained nurse. They will then come to their ministrations in the homes of the poor wherever they are notified of cases of sickness. They wear a uniform and a badge, but they are at liberty to leave the order at any time.

Major James H. Cole's work at Hastings, Neb., has been remarkably blessed of God. A correspondent of the Hastings Herald reports that "several churches joined in the movement with Rev. W. R. Richards, D.D., as chairman of the executive committee. Services have been held in all the churches and in many other places where souls might be reached and brought to Christ. Many business professional men have been brought into the kingdom, and have taken a bold stand in bearing testimony for the Master. Not less than 300 persons have professed conversion."

Mr. and Mrs. Norman W. Keyes, who went to Zealand about a year ago from Grace Church Brooklyn, are now at Durban, studying the language. Engineer Williamson, of the steam "Ardenberg," which reached New York a few days ago, saw Mr. and Mrs. Keyes on his recent voyage and reports them well and hopeful. They saw nearly a bushel of beautiful shells for the children of the Sunday School of Grace Church. Several sailors on the "Ardenberg" have been converted through God's blessing on the efforts of Engin Williamson, who was formerly a dissipated, irreligious man.

THE BIBLE

AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE BURNED CAPITOL.

FIRE has robbed the State of Pennsylvania of the building in which her State legislators have met for seventy-five years past. The Senate and House were being called in order in the Capitol for their afternoon session about one o'clock on February 2, when a puff of smoke was noticed in the Senate Chamber. There had been all morning a smell of fire about the building, but no attention had been paid to it. The puff of the smoke, however, caused a general alarm. The chief-clerk made an investigation, and found that the apartments of Lieutenant-Governor Lyon, on the floor above the Senate Chamber, were on fire. Senators and Senate attaches organized themselves into a bucket-brigade, and buckets of water were passed from hand to hand to the burning room. There was some difficulty in getting at the fire, but an axe was brought and a few blows shivered the wood-work. Instantly a tongue of flame shot forth and showed that the assistance of the fire department would be needed. There was some delay in obtaining it, owing to a mistake in the call-box and, when the brigade arrived, it was too late to save the building. The attaches, on the arrival of the firemen, turned their attention to the State archives and succeeded in removing the most valuable of the records. All were saved except the statistics of the Department of Public Instruction, when the men were driven from the building by smoke and fire. The beams and joists of the old structure fed the flames, and in less than an hour after the discovery of the fire the great dome, which surmounted the Capitol, fell in. The reporters and members of the House, who had packed to the rotunda when the serious nature of the fire was realized, had a narrow escape. Some of them jumped from the windows and others ran the gauntlet of falling burning brands, on the way to the doors. After the fall of the dome, the firemen abandoned the main building and concentrated their efforts on saving the adjacent department offices, and were successful in preventing the fire spreading to them. The burned building was a handsome brick edifice standing on a beautifully wooded knoll. Its erection was begun in 1819, and was finished and occupied in 1822. The original cost was $291,688, and large sums have been spent from time to time in embellishing it. During the last two years, $50,000 have been spent on it, and the rescues were still incomplete. It is estimated that after collecting the $200,000 insurance, the State's loss will be fully $800,000. The Legislature now occupies temporary quarters, and will doubtless make it its first business to provide for a new seat of government which will be more substantial than the old. We may hope that whatsoever its characteristics may be, it will have the one which is to distinguish the new universe that shall take the place of the old when fire has done its work upon that.

The heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat. Nevertheless we look for new heavens and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness. (II. Peter 3: 13.)

A Mother's Long Search.

A Boston journal reports the death of a well-known woman whose appearance had been familiar to the officers of police-courts, work-houses, and hospitals. She was always cleanly but shabbily dressed, and seemed to spend all her time in visiting the public institutions. She took no interest in anything that was going on, but scanned closely the features of the prisoners, inmates and patients. It was evidently a man she was looking for, as she paid no attention to the women who appeared there

One day she fainted in court and was so weak after she regained consciousness that she was sent to the hospital. She was suffering from exposure and lack of nourishment. In the hospital she was kindly treated but she gradually grew weaker and she was finally told that death was not far off. Then she told her secret to one of the nurses. She had been looking for her son, who had been led away, got into trouble and had been sent to State's prison. She did not know of it at the time, and when she did hear the sad news, he had been released and no one could tell where he had gone. She had sought him ever since, a period of twenty years. She felt sure she would see him in some police court, or in prison, but her search had been in vain. "I wish I could have seen him," the old woman said, "he is very like discouraged. I wanted to tell him he has two friends who will always stand by him: God and his old mother. I've got to give up the hunt it seems, but I'll leave you his name and if he ever drifts in here, I want you should tell him how his mother looked and looked for him to the last." The nurse keel had been torn off for a distance of one hundred and twenty-five feet, and that the steel plates and rivets had been sheared away in some places. Orders were given to remove all the coal and ammunition from the vessel to lighten her so that she might be taken up the river again to be repaired at Cramp's ship-yard where she was built. It is by the same course that moral disasters in human lives are retrieved. Many a man has been saved by being led to his Maker for renovation, but sometimes he does not make the journey until all his possessions and his reputation have been taken from him.

A deceived heart hath turned him aside that he cannot deliver his soul. . . . Remember these O, Israel, for thou art my servant: I have formed thee: I have blotted out as a thick cloud thy transgressions. . . . Return unto me for I have redeemed thee. (Isa. 44: 20-22.)

A Relic of the Revolution.

A gentleman who has been visiting friends in the State of Maine reports seeing on the walls of a homestead at which he took refuge in a storm, an interesting relic of revolutionary times. It was an old letter, framed and glazed. The writer was the grandfather of the present owner. At the time of writing he was in the revolutionary army. It was addressed to his wife, and was dated June 18, 1775, the day after the battle of Bunker Hill. The patriot soldier wrote: "I right these few lines to let you know that I am well as I expected to be. Through good Providence God saved my life. But we expect culated with great nicety, so as to throw the great mass about forty feet forward, that it might fall at the exact place where it would effectually close the gap. Intense interest was taken by the engineers and workmen in the project, and on the day appointed for the explosion all left the works and gathered in a safe place to watch the result of their labors. The foreman closed the switch, and instantly there rose from the hillside a number of little tongues of vapor. For the fraction of a second the mountain had a fuzzy appearance, as if hundreds of subterranean chimneys were smoking. Then there was a great quiver and a roar like the firing of a whole park of artillery, and then the stupendous mass of granite rock four hundred feet long and averaging fifty feet high, weighing about two hundred thousand tons, was lifted in the air from its primeval bed and dropped at the entrance to the canyon, in the exact spot intended by the engineers. The final success of the great work was due to the patient, skillful work of the previous months, during which the army of laborers had been toiling without much to show as results of their work. It will be so with the toil of Christ's workers in the world. Missionaries, preachers, evangelists and writers toil on amid discouragements, patiently awaiting that time when all obstructions to Gospel progress will be removed, the whole earth will turn to God and the promise of God to his servant be fulfilled.

Who art thou, O great mountain? Before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain. (Zech. 4: 7.)

Growing Under Colored Lights.

A curious discovery about the effect of colored lights on the growth of plants has been made by the French scientist, Camille Flammarion. It has long been known that the quantity of sunlight a plant receives has a marked effect on its coloring and its strength. A plant which has little sunlight is always pale and sickly compared with one that grows in the full light of the sun's rays, although both may have the same conditions of soil and heat. But the sun's rays are made up of separate constituents having distinct properties. Some are simply dispensers of light, others of heat, while others have a chemical activity. Flammarion wanted to discover which kind of rays it was that plants used, and what were the special benefits derived from them. He accordingly made an experimental test. He planted seeds of the Mimosa Sensitiva plant in four pots of the same size and filled with exactly the same kind of soil. They were put in the same hot-house and were treated alike until each plant had grown one inch out of the soil. There was no difference in their development. The scientist then suspended over one plant a bell of red glass so that only the rays unabsorbed by a red medium should reach the plant. Over another he hung a green bell, over another a blue bell, and over the fourth a plain uncolored bell. The effect was soon apparent, and was more perceptible every week. At the end of two months the plant under the red glass was sixteen inches high, while that under the blue glass had not grown at all and was still one inch above the soil. The plant under the green glass was five inches high and that under the colorless glass four inches. Under the red light also the plant blossomed earlier but the plant itself was more delicate and sensitive. The plant under the white light was stronger than any and the buds were more healthy. The plant subjected to the blue light though rich in the coloring of its leaves, was stunted, had no blooms and was not at all sensitive. The light was the same in all cases but in three of the four, its effects were changed by the medium through which it reached the plant. Perhaps some of the differences in spiritual life may have a similar cause. The light God gives for spiritual development reaches souls through different mediums of physical temperament. A Christian of sanguine temperament may have a premature and unhealthy development while a Christian of gloomy temperament does not develop at all.

There are diversities of operations but it is the same God which worketh all in all. But the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal. (I. Cor. 12:7.) promised, and that night the old woman died. It may be hoped that the son will get his mother's message and that when he learns that his last human friend is gone he will seek the more earnestly that best Friend of the friendless.

There is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother. (Prov. 18: 24.)

The Cruiser's Mishap.

The new United States cruiser Brooklyn has to go into dock for repairs at the very beginning of her career. Press dispatches from Philadelphia report that the new vessel struck on a rock while proceeding down the Delaware River and sustained extensive injuries. It appears that her captain considered his position at League Island unsafe as the ice was coming down the river in large floes which might injure the ship's propellers. He therefore decided to seek a safer anchorage. He tried to reach Cramp's ship-yard where the ship would be out of danger. But after weighing anchor it was found that the ice was too heavy to be penetrated safely, and the vessel was therefore headed down the river for the government pier at Marcus Hook, sixteen miles below Philadelphia. The pilots, whom the captain consulted, assured him that the channel was perfectly safe. The cruiser, however, had not proceeded far when she struck some obstruction with a blow that made her quiver from stem to stern. She went on and reached Marcus Hook safely, but the hull was severely damaged and several compartments were full of water. The builders of the ship had her examined and found that the plating on the side of the to go at it again to-day very hot. I puts my trust in God. I hope to see you again. Don't send my things before you here from me again. No more at present. I hain't time to write no more." It is obvious that the letters are not prized on account of their orthography, grammar or literary merit, but because the owner is proud of an ancestor who risked his life in his country's cause. Such a relic would be treasured in any patriot's family, and even by men who hold in light esteem the words of Him who gave his life not for one country only but for the redemption of the whole race.

Thou wast slain and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood out of every kindred and tongue and people and nation. (Rev. 5: 9.)

Breaking up a Mountain.

San Francisco journals describe an extraordinary engineering feat which was recently successfully accomplished at San Diego, Cal. A great dam is being constructed to impound water for the use of the city, and the engineers proposed to tear off one side of a mountain to fill up the gorge and close the outflow. For two months past, preparations for the work have been in progress. Tunnels were cut in the mountain at various heights above the bed of the creek, and connections made so that the whole side of the mountain might fall solidly. These were filled with giant powder, more than a hundred thousand pounds being used. When all was ready, insulated electric wires were introduced, and attached in one circuit to an exploder high up on the other side of the gorge. The direction of the tunnels had been cal-

THE DISCIPLES DISPERSED.

Sunday School Lesson for Feb. 26.

Acts 8:1-17. Golden Text, Acts 8:4.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

HE first Christians were Jews. "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem, they shall prosper that love thee" (Ps. 122:6) is an Old Testament command and promise. It is true that the command of Christ to the eleven had been, "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature" (Mark 16:15), yet to a larger company (Luke 24:33), which included the apostles, he had given the injunction, "Beginning at Jerusalem" (Luke 24:47), and again (Acts 1:8), he had just before his ascension spoken to the apostles of Jerusalem as the starting point for the ultimate preaching of the Gospel "into the uttermost parts of the earth." Jerusalem was not yet fully evangelized; much remained to be done there; how could they leave the beloved city? The early disciples were in danger of forgetting that they were to move forward.

While the persecution and death of Stephen ripened the manifestation of Christ in this first martyr of the church, it brought to a head the enmity of the chief priests and their sin of resisting the Holy Ghost, and the city which would not tolerate the Son of God in her midst, would not endure the presence of his disciples either. There arose against the church which was at Jerusalem, and the blessed company of saints which had been of one heart and one mind, and on all of whom "great grace" was manifested, must now, in quite other circumstances, live and witness for Jesus. This was the weaning of the infant church. Having learned the precious lesson of unity and mutual dependence, they must now learn to stand, each alone with the Lord in the rude, uncongenial atmosphere of a believing world. Saul, of whom we shall hear later, was the chief persecutor; the martyr and the persecutor were ripened by the same chain of circumstances.

Devout men carried Stephen to his burial and made great lamentation over him. But the persecutors were on their track, and very soon they had to flee, driven out from Jerusalem, suddenly torn from house and home, and above all, from the company of the faithful. What would Holy Ghost filled men do under such circumstances? The Lord had taught them to "rejoice and be exceedingly glad, for great should be their reward in heaven" (Matt. 5:10-12). This was the test whether they really lived for themselves, or for its sake denied themselves. In the former case they would feel injured, bemoan their fate, and think some strange thing had happened unto them (1. Peter 4:12). In the latter, they would "count it all joy" (James 1:2) to suffer for his name's sake, and would go forth to win others to the Lord they loved. This is exactly what they did do. "Scattered abroad throughout all the regions of Judea and Samaria," they "went about preaching the Word" (Acts 8:14).

Philip, one of the seven deacons, as Stephen had been, went down to the city of Samaria and proclaimed unto them the Christ" (RV.). A great movement took place, the multitudes gave heed with one accord unto the things that were spoken by Philip, when they heard, and saw the signs which he did. There was special power present to cast out unclean spirits which cried with a loud voice, and with no doubt there was great excitement. All over the city the formerly possessed, the once palsied and lame were walking about as witnesses of the power of God with his servants. And there was in that city." Joy is spoken of as the special characteristic of this work in Samaria. The characteristic which was most striking on the day of Pentecost was unity and self-renunciation: they "had all things common" and gave away their goods to all who had need, while at the same time "they did eat their bread with gladness and singleness of heart, praising God." (Acts 2:27). It would seem that this work at Samaria was on a lower level than the work at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost and immediately after. At Pentecost the disciples were "all filled with the Holy Ghost," but the Holy Ghost had, as yet, fallen upon none of the converts at Samaria.

We are reminded of the seed which fell upon the rocky soil and which Jesus likens to him that heareth the Word and straightway with joy receiveth it; yet hath he not life of sorcery and self-glorification into a belief in Christ without himself coming down to the cross as a broken, sinful nothing. In such a conversion, the foundation is not well laid, and when the storm comes the ruin of that house will be great.

Tidings of this great awakening reached the ears of the apostles, who, when the remainder of the church was scattered, themselves tarried in Jerusalem. Did Philip tell them, or did something in the account they received of what was transpiring make them alive to the fact that the work was not fully on Pentecostal lines? Peter and John were sent to see and through them the Holy Spirit was given.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

THREE figures stand out prominently in the lesson. First there is the persecutor Saul who was destined to become the greatest teacher and preacher in the early church. The zeal which distinguished Paul the preacher, characterized Saul the persecutor. The Gospel does not change men's mental character. It turns it in a new direction. Saul was evidently looking on with satisfaction at this murder of Stephen, and it stirred him up to new activity, for he began a search for other victims, officiously supplementing the efforts of the priests and the Sanhedrim to whom the duty properly belonged. The fiery, active, young Pharisee was very much in earnest, and as he tells us after his conversion, he was perfectly conscientious. He thought he was doing a good work in hunting

The people were a mixed race whose origin is described in 11 Kings 17:24-29. He going there confirms the suspicion that Philip was a Grecian Jew, as the Palestine Jew hated the Samaritans whom he regarded as little better than heathen (Jo 4:9). We remember how surprised the disciples were when they saw Christ in a friendly conversation with a Samaritan man. Whether any traces of the results of Christ's visit of ten years before remain we are not told, but Philip's preaching was successful. The people who, like the Jews were looking for a Messiah were convinced Philip worked miracles and as they were of the beneficent kind the people rejoiced and flocked into the Christian church. It is evident, however, that although Philip could work miracles he had not the power of imparting the special gifts of the Holy Spirit. The presence of the Holy Spirit was manifest in the conversion of the people, but for the special Pentecostal gift the presence of an Apostle was needed and Peter and John were sent to impart them.

Simon the sorcerer was one of the most conspicuous converts. As we learn from Josephus he claimed to be an emanation from God, and like the ancient Egyptian magicians, did some wonderful tricks. It is not necessary to believe that he was really a sorcerer. He and his teaching may have stumbled on some clue to what we now know as hypnotism, and he done things that to the people appeared miraculous. He was naturally impressed by what he saw Philip do, and probably thought that Philip was such a marvel himself, but of a higher order of skill. He therefore attached himself to Philip and helped in the work. As we know, from his subsequent conduct, it was the money that might be made out of the business that attracted him, and not the truth of Christianity. He earned a bad immunity for himself in the name that is given to the offence of purchasing a place in the church. To this day a man who buys a religious office is said to have "committed simony." But he did not show his motive at first. He believed and was baptized, but it did him no good. People do not believe that baptism, or even faith, unless accompanied by a new heart can save a man, should study this incident of Simon.

Went everywhere preaching. So the enemies of Christ were the means of propagating the truth, by scattering its sowers. God often overrules the designs of wicked men for the good of his cause. An old historian relates how William Tyndale was at his wit's end for money to continue his work of printing the Bible in English, when his treasury was unexpectedly replenished by orders from booksellers and exporters. The new demand arose through the purchases of Augustine Packington, a merchant at Antwerp, who was commissioned by the Bishop of London, and Thomas More to purchase all of Tyndale's New Testaments he could lay his hands on. These were publicly burned at Paul's Cross, and the booksellers having sold their stocks, wanted more, and were ready to buy, knowing that if they could not sell them to the public, they could always sell them to the Bishop for burning, and so for some time Tyndale and his helpers were maintained.

There was great joy in that city. Probably some of it was due to the work of healing which Philip performed through the power of Christ. There was a case in a hospital not long ago where joy came in the opposite way. A miner lay there on the operating table. He had been hurt by the fall of a heavy piece of coal, his leg had been crushed and it had to be cut off. The man was young, but he had been a leader in wickedness. His pious mother's heart was almost broken by his disobedience. He was very popular among the miners in spite of his wickedness; she said because of his wickedness. After the operation and he was beginning to get better, a few of the miners went to the hospital to condole with him on the loss of his leg. To their surprise, they found him bright and cheerful. "It's the best that could have happened to me, mates," he said. "I doubt whether anything else could have stopped me. I was going to hell as fast as I could go, but now I'm saved." The chaplain has been here every day, and I have quit my sins and given myself to the Lord. I feel so happy that if I had lost both legs, I would have reckoned it was worth it to have my leg saved. I don't need pity."

root in himself, but endureth for a while; when tribulation or persecution ariseth because of the Word, straightway he stumbleth (Matt. 13:20-21 R.V.). Having sought his own joy as the main object of his conversion, when anything happens which he does not like, he begins to backslide. This is not the work of the Holy Ghost; this kind of conversion is either in the intellect or in emotions; it has not reached "the hidden man of the heart in that which is not corruptible" (1. Peter 3:3). Such conversions were possible at Samaria; such was the conversion of Simon the sorcerer. Up to this time he was the most popular man in Samaria. The foolish inhabitants had taken him at his own valuation, and believed in his claim that he was "some great one." The people called him "the great power of God." But those who are great with God's greatness are always little in their own eyes.

This man, still seeking himself, when he saw the Word of God, by Philip, was deeply impressed. He would no longer hold his own against the mighty power of the work of conversion and healing which was going on all around him; he, too, believed, and, no doubt honestly as far as he went, but there was no surrender of his whole being to God. Philip, glad as any evangelist would be, to have secured such a convert, let him continue with him, and probably a very great stumbling-block in the way of many was removed when this well-known sorcerer was seen among the ranks of the disciples of Jesus, a baptized believer. But in this man's conversion there is no account given of a thorough break up of the heart, no humble confession; he seems to have stepped out of his Christians, putting them in prison and setting the law in motion against them. The fact is worth noting, because there are so many people who believe the conscience is a safe guide. Here was a conscientious man active in cruel and wicked work. His case is a warning to all persecutors, who like him, may under a mistaken belief, do things which in after life may cause them unavailing remorse.

Philip was not Philip the Apostle, but the deacon, one of the seven appointed (Acts 6:5) to distribute funds to the poor. He was probably a Grecian Jew like Stephen, and this fact may account for his missionary journey. The Apostles were able to stay in Jerusalem. They were Palestine Jews and the people had no quarrel with them. They went up to the Temple to pray and were punctilious in the discharge of the Jewish observances. The Sadducees were exasperated with them, but the Sadducees were unpopular, and the people took the part of the Apostles in the conflict. But the Grecians were different. They were suspected of speaking slightly of the old religion and of the Temple, and against them the people were aroused. But as commonly happens with persecution, the persecutors defeated their own objects. They wanted to keep the new doctrines from spreading, but in scattering its advocates, they provided the means of its wider propagation. They went everywhere preaching the word, Stephen's fate did not deter them. When he fell, Philip stepped into his place and continued his work. He went northward toward Galilee to Samaria, probably the city of that name now called Sebastieh in the province of Samaria, and preached there.

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE.

THE WING ON THE BONNET.

Just in front of my pew sits a maiden—
A little brown wing on her hat,
With its touches of tropical azure,
And sheen of the sun upon that,
Through the bloom-colored pane shines a glory
By which the vast shadows are stirred,
But I pine for the spirit and splendor
That painted the wing of the bird.
The organ rolls down its great anthem;
With the soul of a song it is blent;
But for me, I am sick for the singing
Of one little song that is spent.
The voice of the curate is gentle,
"No sparrow shall fall to the ground;"
But the poor broken wing on the bonnet
Is mocking the merciful sound.

Warming Poverty's Homes.

1000 Shivering Families Cheered
Daily by Mr. Nathan Straus' Poor Man's Coal Yards in New York.

At this season of the year, when the keen and piercing winds of winter intensify the sufferings of the poor, it is consoling to know that the forlorn condition of many in our large cities does not pass together unheeded. There are, in our communities everywhere, men and women to be blessed with abundance of this world's goods, employ their wealth as stewards, for God's glory and the benefit of their less fortunate fellow-beings. If the record of even a part of the individual philanthropies of this class were written, it would make such a showing as would surprise many of those who rail at all wealth indiscriminately as an evidence of selfishness and hard-heartedness. There is no nobler factor in a community than the individual who, being prospered in his affairs, recognizes the source of his prosperity by consecrating a liberal portion of his substance to good works, and thus transforms his wealth into a blessing to surround him.

Among the many practical benevolences induced by private enterprise in New York, there is probably none that commands itself more strongly to public approval than the Cheap Coal Stations for the poor, opened on the east and west sides of the city, by Mr. Nathan Straus, a well-known wealthy merchant. That on the east side is at the river front, foot of East Third Street, in what is known as the coal-district. A long shed on the dock is used as a depot, and three or four coal-dredge boats are towed to that point each week, and their contents lifted into big bins on the wharf, from which they are doled out into bags, baskets, boxes, wheelbarrows, tiny express wagons and a variety of other receptacles that are brought here by the poverty-stricken purchasers. It is a moving sight to see the crowds that assemble in line to take advantage of the cheap coal distribution. Men, old and young, some ragged, others poorly yet decently clad, women in shawls and dragging babies with them, and children too thinly clothed to resist the nipping winter winds, all stand shivering and awaiting their turn. Some who have no money have a card or a note, from some well-known pastor or physician, which is certain to secure them a free supply. All day long this coal distribution continues at the east side depot as well as that at Pier 52, North River, and while daylight lasts the recession to and from these points is constantly in motion. The coal is sold at wholesale rates, 35 pounds for five cents. An average of 5,000 tickets are sold daily. These cheap coal depots enable many hundreds of the very poorer families to keep warm and comparatively comfortable in the chilliest weeks in winter. To many they undoubtedly mean the saving of life, or though the slums and tenements may welter in summer, they are even more wretched as winter abodes and cold and starvation easily find victims. To such miserable homes cheap coal—and more particularly free coal—is a genuine blessing. Over a hundred tons are distributed daily at the East River depot and fully fifty tons at the North River shed, and it can be readily understood what an amount of good is accomplished in a single day when it is stated that the average purchaser buys ten cents worth, or seventy pounds, equal to two days' fuel supply for a small stove or grate fire.

This unique philanthropy is one that might serve as a good example for others to follow in those sections where the hard winter bears heavily upon the poor. Mr. Straus is a loser on every pound of coal he sells, and bears the expense of management and help besides; but he is gainer in the grander sense of having helped his fellow men and fulfilled the injunction which imposes upon us the sacred duty of remembering the poor.

Strange Uses for Dolls.

Although in civilized countries dolls are associated with childhood and the nursery, there are not a few places on the globe where they are used for quite a different purpose. Rev. A. Findlater, has gathered from numerous sources all the available information on this subject and the compilation is one of peculiar interest. In many barbarous nations, the women continue to carry dolls long after they have passed their youth. Among the Bechuanas and Basutos in Africa, it is customary for the women to carry dolls until they have children of their own. When twins are born, it is the custom in certain tribes to slay the younger, in the superstitious belief that there can be but one soul between the two and that nothing but evil can come if both are permitted to live. A doll is substituted in place of the murdered babe. Most of the dolls used by the savages are of wood, although some are of ivory, an elephant's tusk being utilized for the purpose.

"Saying" and "Praying."

Mr. Moody, the well-known evangelist, tells this pretty incident concerning his own little son: "My wife came down one evening, and said she had had some trouble with one of the children. He was not willing to obey, and he had gone off to bed without asking her forgiveness. I went up and sat down by the side of the little child and said: 'Did you pray to-night?' 'I said my prayers.' 'Did you pray?' 'I said my prayers.' 'Did you pray?' 'Well, papa, I told you that I said my prayers.' 'Yes, I heard you, but did you pray?' The little fellow was stuck; he knew he hadn't prayed. How was he going to pray when there was something wrong in his heart. He could not do it. 'Well now,' said I, 'are you going to go off to sleep without praying?' After a struggle, he said, 'I wish you would call mamma.' She came up and was glad to forgive him, and then he wanted to get out of bed and pray. He had said his prayers, but he wanted to pray. Lots of people say their prayers, just as a salve to their conscience, and go out and do some mean, contemptible thing after they have said their prayers. But they hadn't prayed, and that's the difference."

President's Daughters.

Besides the present "White House babies," there are living at this time eight surviving daughters of Presidents of the United States. These are enumerated in an article in The Ladies' Home Journal. Mrs. Letitia Tyler Semple is the eldest of the group and Mrs. Philip Pendleton Dandridge the next. The former is the daughter of President Tyler, and is living in the Louise Home, Washington, D. C. Mrs. Dandridge is the daughter of President Taylor, and presided at most of the White House functions during her father's brief tenure of the Presidential office. She lives in Winchester. The only surviving daughter of President Johnson, Mrs. Martha Johnson Patterson, lives in the old Johnson homestead at Greenville, Tenn. Mrs. Ellen W. Grant Sartoris, only daughter of President Grant, is now living in Washington. The only daughter of President Hayes, Miss Fanny Hayes, passes much of the winter in travel, and spends her summer at the homestead in Fremont, O. Mrs. Mary Garfield Stanley Brown, the "little Mollie" of the Garfield family, lives in Washington during the winter and at the old family homestead in Ohio during

A Woman's Idea of California Roses.

I. Longman, Whittier, Calif., writes us: In THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of December 23d, was a letter from Beaumont, Tex., written by Mrs. W. A. Ward, describing "the Roses of Texas." The letter very much interested me, and I felt as if I would like to give to your readers a brief description of the roses of Southern California. As the Texas writer said, the roses of the north are inferior. The roses bloom here all the year 'round, and grow to a height of from eight to ten feet. I am a native of Maryland and have traveled across the United States coming from Salem, Oregon, last November to Whittier. In all of my travels I have not found so beautiful a country as this. We have had not so much as a frost this winter. From Whittier I can see the waters of the Pacific eighteen miles off to the south, while off to the north can be seen the Sierra Madre Mountains all covered with snow. At Whittier the average temperature is about 70°. A great many people from the North and East come here to spend the winter among the roses.

A Step-mother Speaks.

Surely the step-mother, so often and so unjustly accused, is happy in her numerous and loving defenders. In our mail this week is a letter from Mrs. S. Maria S., of Fort Missoula, Mont., which affords another illustration of how a step-mother may be loved by those of her household. The writer says:

Noticing in the issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD which has just reached me in my garrison home, a beautiful article on "The Step-mother's Defenders," I beg to add the following upon the same subject: I am a step-mother. My own daughter is married and abroad. My son, who is also married, is often called upon to take long journeys from his home. I have with me here three step-sons, one of whom is about fourteen. Yesterday morning I was not well, and did not come down to breakfast. The children conceived the idea that I was fretting over the absence of my daughter and son, and as they left for school without seeing me, the thought remained with them. Judge of my feelings on their return when the fourteen-year-old son came into the parlor where I was sitting and asked me to listen while he read the enclosed original verses to me. He said the thought had been "bothering" him all day. These are some of the verses:

A CONSOLATION.

Respectfully dedicated to Mother by "Duck."

FRET not thyself, dear mother,
If thy daughter has to go
Across the deep blue ocean—
'Tis God that wills it so.

Remember, Oh, remember!
That God, with his, above—
Doth watch o'er all his children
With such sweet, tender love!

FRET not thyself, dear mother,
If thy son is called to go
Upon a dangerous journey—
'Tis God that wills it so.

Remember, Oh, remember!
That God is ever near,
And he that is in danger
May have no cause to fear.

Remember, Oh, remember!
Though thou art left alone
And all from thee have parted
That God will bring thee home.

FRET not thyself, dear mother,
When life is ebbing low—
If caused death's gates to enter—
'Tis God that wills it so.

Remember, Oh, remember!
Though earthly life should cease,
Thou leave'st footprints behind thee,
To guide us on to peace.

A Young Folks' Paradise.

All travelers unite in declaring that Japan is the ideal playground for children and that more attention is paid by the Japanese, as a nation, to child-happiness, than is the case in any other part of the Eastern world. A correspondent gives this entertaining description of child-life in the Mikado's empire: "Japanese children are never bashful or sullen. They look you straight in the face, never draw back if you call them to you, and although intimidated by the familiarity of strangers, they smile at you if you show them a friendly face. Two days in the year are exclusively devoted to the children. At Tokio, Kioto, Yokohama, and in all the cities of Japan there is a day when the shops are full of toys, little models of persons or things, or even figures of the entire Japanese Court in miniature. This is on the great holiday for little girls. At this time large and small are dressed in garments of all colors. The mothers are very proud of these toilets.

The corresponding boys' holiday falls on May 5. Then they are seen scat-

THE KING'S HIGHWAY

A STORY OF THE BROADER CHRIST-LIFE

WRITTEN SPECIALLY FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

Nicholas Lloyd, a wealthy financier, whose whole mind runs on money-making schemes, is living with his wife and his daughter Alice at his beautiful country-house. An only son, Stephen, has become estranged from his father, and spends most of the time at sea. Among Stephen's acquaintances are John McAslin and his sister Jessie, the former a noble-hearted young lawyer and writer with progressive ideas concerning social and moral reforms, and the latter a bright, warm-hearted girl, who is greatly admired by Stephen. Mrs. Lloyd is a woman of emotional nature and almost worships her boy with whom her husband has quarrelled. She is wealthy in her own right, but is a mere cipher at home, Nicholas Lloyd ruling all with an iron hand. He is ambitious to make a brilliant match for Alice, and has already chosen for her future husband Lord Medway, a young English peer, but Mrs. Lloyd opposes the match. Before leaving on his voyage, Stephen visits his home and through his diplomatic arrangement, Jessie McAslin, with whom he is in love but who knows him by another name, is engaged as music teacher to Alice Lloyd.

At a meeting of workmen, at which a pending strike is discussed, John McAslin and Steve take very decided ground against extreme measures and an encounter occurs between Steve and a bully in which the latter is badly worsted. Mr. Lloyd, who has read some of McAslin's arguments on labor and capital in the magazines, invites him to meet a few other gentlemen equally interested in social reforms, at his residence. There, a friendly discussion occurs, and he is so struck with the native ability of the young man that he engages him as his secretary. McAslin's favorite doctrine is that all wealth should be consecrated to the highest and noblest uses, that there is no such thing as irresponsible riches, and that Christ was the true exponent, for both the ancients and moderns, of the reforms necessary for the universal betterment of social conditions.

Alice Lloyd learns to love the young reformer, and Mrs. Lloyd is awakened, by his conversation, to the need of a better stewardship of her own wealth. Lord Medway urges his suit for Alice's hand, and Mr. Lloyd, on laying his proposal before his daughter, is astounded by her absolute refusal to accept the nobleman as a husband. He attempts coercion, but Mrs. Lloyd unexpectedly summons courage and confronts him with the threat to withdraw her private fortune from his business, if he persists in forcing the match, and bringing on Alice all the misery of a loveless marriage such as she herself had endured. After a stormy scene, the great financier, so long used to control in all matters, business and domestic, yields to the inevitable to avert a draft upon his resources that might involve him in financial ruin. Meanwhile, the watchful mother has noted the growing affection between her daughter and John McAslin and is pleased with the prospects of such a union.

"WHAT AILS THIS HEART OF MINE?"

MRS. LLOYD held to this position even with regard to Lord Medway, though, at her daughter's urgent request, she accompanied her in the morning to the interview which Lord Medway desired, but she took little part in their conversation. The young noble had never before looked so handsome, and never before been so self-effacing. He regretted, with apparent sincerity, the publicity given to his aspirations, because they appeared so egotistical on his part, and because Alice had felt this publicity to be an offense. He declared his affection to be sincere and lasting, and asked permission to renew his addresses, when a year in society should have better enabled her to know her own position and what was demanded of it.

Alice felt it to be impossible to say any of the disagreeable things she had intended to say. When a man puts himself, metaphorically, at a woman's feet, it is hard for her to wantonly insult him. She found no presumption to snub, and no claims were made on her future kindness which she thought it necessary to deny. And Medway really felt the disappointment in his pocket, and his pocket greatly influenced his life. His dreams of unlimited credit and unlimited expenditure were over, or at least postponed, and another year of financial straits and annoyances was before him. The thought of this condition impressed a despondency on his face and manner which Alice was led to believe she was entirely answerable for. It had its effect, for when he asked: "May I return to Lloyd Park next summer?" she was unable to give a decided refusal. So he went away with a hope which he trusted time and social influences would bring to perfection.

As soon as he was really gone, Alice experienced a kind of regret. All that he could give her appeared for the moment so desirable. She said to her mother: "I cannot feel certain about anything. What do you think, mother?"

"Well, Alice, there is one test of both men and matter—that of practice. The world always asks of everything, 'Will it work? If not, it must go.' Ask yourself, 'Do I love him well enough to live with him all our lives, to bear with all his faults, to forgive his neglect, to nurse him in sickness, to take an interest in all that interests him?' If not, a marriage with him will not work. It must go."

"Then I think it must go, mother."

"Be sure in your own mind, Alice."

"Why didn't I rather speak to me this morning?"

"There was no need to trouble you. I had a conversation with him last night, while you were singing with Mr. McAslin. He promised me to authoritatively deny the report of yesterday, and also to allow you the fullest and freest choice in the matter of your marriage."

"Oh!"

It was all she said, it was all she wished to say, at the time. That strange inde-do not seem to be wholly satisfying things."

"But Miss Lloyd reads and plays and sings, and has friends. These are satisfying things," answered John.

"Oh, John, you tire of books; they do all the talking; and you cannot be always playing and singing to yourself. And as to friends that all pay their visits on the same afternoon, and who dare not say one unconventional word, what pleasure is there in them?"

"But the coolness and verdure of the country; its—"

"John, I do not believe in the coolness of the country. And the dense green of the woods is depressing beyond everything. The river glares. The long, dusty lanes are awful. I prefer the city. No place in summer is so cheery and comfortable as New York. You are never disappointed in its supplies. Ice-creams, and the best of fruits are at every corner. I find Central Park sylvan enough. The streets have always a shady side. There is a constant point of interest somewhere—a concert, a show, a lecture, or a labor meeting. Yes, I wish the Lloyds would come back to the city. I am tired to death of the country."

"I enjoy my visits there very much."

"Apparently Alice enjoys them also."

"What makes you say that, Jessie?"

"She talks a great deal about you in an underhand way."

"I don't like the word 'underhand,' Jessie. What do you mean by it?"

"I mean that she gets me to talk about you. I say to myself constantly, 'If Miss to the New York pavements, to feel at liberty to be herself, look as cross or as happy as she wanted to, to walk as quickly as felt like walking, to speak with all plainness or emphasis she desired."

It was different with John. The swiftness of the alleys of the garden, the shadowy woods, even the long vistas of dusty country lanes were full of all delight to him, for Alice was very often his companion in them. She frequently drove the railway station for her father and John and then in the moonlight evenings the early mornings, they found themselves together without any special planning the meeting. There were always roses to be cut or the bees to look at, or the grass to gather, or a new chrysanthemum to classify. Oh, love had a thousand excuses. Love made all events to serve his own sires and purposes!

And the silence and ceremony of the Lloyd household pleased John. It seemed the proper atmosphere for Alice. She made glory in its dimness, and music in its silence. The flutter of her white movements, the rose-like loveliness of her face, the grace and harmony of her movements, all these things seemed to John but outward manifestations of a pure, guileless soul. He wondered at Jessie's waning enthusiasm; Lloyd Park was to him the loveliest spot on earth; it was the home of Alice, and her presence, or memory of it, invested the whole place with the glamor and glory of love.

Mr. Lloyd had not the slightest suspicion of this attachment; indeed, it was unfessed by the lovers themselves. John knew it, but John feared to speak, lest he had been too presumptuous. Alice felt to listen, lest words should destroy the definable, ineffable charm of their conscious silence. She did not wish to be brought to resolution and acknowledgment. In such case, she would have decided a question she did not wish to consider. She was too happy to make inquiry about her happiness. She feared to do so. She had an instinctive apprehension that the delicate bloom on the cheek of Psyche might easily be soiled by wasted by too much examination. John had the same delicacy of feeling; he divined that while love was shyly advancing and retreating, it was well to let alone.

Mrs. Lloyd was not as ignorant as her husband of the condition of affairs between her daughter and John McAslin, for she was naturally an observing woman, though her sense of observation had been dulled by long neglect. She had so fully trained herself not to see what was retained to this life, that a sentiment so delicate and undemonstrative might have easily escaped her notice; yet in a passing manner she was aware of it, and the knowledge did not trouble her. "John is good, and clever, and likely to have a brilliant career, and Alice might do much worse than marry him," was generally the conclusion she came to, if she gave the matter consideration; a thing that under circumstances as yet did not often come to her mind.

Besides, during these summer and autumn months, she had been entertaining a new and absorbing interest. Her interview with her lawyer had been one of great importance. To her amazement, she had found him not only willing, but anxious to aid her in the great work she was so fully planning. For the words spoken by John McAslin had sunk into her heart, and troubled its still depths into active, conscious thought. The force and meaning of these words remained with her; and in actual order, she could not remember.

"But Mr. Telford," she said, "I am made to understand that my money is not mine; that I am only a steward for others; that I must not only render to God the things which are God's, but also unto man the things that are man's; and that if I do not do this I shall have the fate of the unjust steward. And this 'outer darkness' and the 'binding hand of foot' terrifies me. What can it mean? Help me to escape from it at any cost and cost."

"I will be your friend and helper in this matter most gladly," he answered. "I am thankful that you have realized your responsibility before it is too late. Your father made money and he left it to you, and you have simply buried it in a napkin. Even his silent growth accuses you. Let it be silent money too long, madame, make it speak."

"IT HAS BEEN SILENT MONEY TOO LONG," SAID THE LAWYER.

cision which gives to whatever we are likely to lose a renewed worth and interest was troubling her heart. Between Lord Medway and her father's paid secretary there was a social gulf whose width and depth she was able pretty accurately to measure, and for a moment she told herself it was impossible to cross it. Then she remembered that between Lord Medway and John McAslin, as men, there was a mental and moral gulf greater than the social one. John would lift her higher than all her hopes and aspirations. To walk on the same plane with Lord Medway, she must sink lower than herself every way. John's voice and presence set her soul vibrating like music. For Lord Medway she had, at most, an experimental interest, made up of flattered vanity and tolerant indifference. "It won't work," she said to herself. "He may go back to England and stay there." And yet she sighed, and wondered "why the nice lover was always the poor one."

After this event was fairly past, there was one of those pauses in life which generally follow periods of great feeling or great excitement. Jessie began to think her visit to Lloyd Park a little monotonous, and to wonder at the stupid life some rich people endured.

"The same things occur every day, and at the same hour," she said to John, "and though the place is pretty, and the house beautiful, river views and fine furniture

Alice wants to pull out the stop called John, she shall play on it herself," and then, before I know, I am telling her about your last speech, or describing some of your Western adventures, or explaining how good you are to father and mother, or in some other obvious way preaching for my saint. And she sits smiling and listening, and answering me, and encouraging me in monosyllables, and I call that 'underhand.' But it must give her pleasure, or she would not always begin such a conversation. However, John, even with you to talk about, the time goes very slowly, and I am ready for a change. I wonder where Steve is. When did you hear from him?"

"Yesterday. He said he was going to the Baltic. He is a queer fellow."

"He is nice enough. A great many people are much less interesting than Steve Morrison."

Change, however, does not come because it is wished for, nor can it ever be safely forced. Indeed, it is a wise provision that for the majority, duty stands guard over wayward inclinations. Duty kept Jessie safely on its homely sward, and the weeks went not unhappily away. The most wearisome days were those she spent at Lloyd Park, and Alice finally found it impossible to detain her beyond her business hours. She felt the sweet alleys of the garden lonely, and the stillness and method of the fine house oppressed her. After its ceremony and quiet, it was a joy to step lightly

SALVATION.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic: "What Christ Saves from," for the Week Beginning Feb. 26. Titus 3: 1-7.

WHEN the anxious soul prays that it may be saved, when, as we say, a man seeks salvation, there is often a very vague notion of what salvation means. In many cases it does not go beyond the mere desire to be saved from perdition, from the punishment of sin in the dark vault, the penitentiary of the universe, where hope is excluded and there is weeping and wailing and unavailing remorse. Well, it is a very motive, but if it brings the trembling soul into contact with Christ, it becomes a useful purpose. There are some motives to which no higher motive would appeal. They are in dread of suffering, or they are anxious to avoid it. Christ saves them in that sense. They are assured that when that hour comes which awaits every man, when they must quit their mortal bodies and go forth into the mysterious realm of which we can have no conception, they will be safe in the hands of Him who has passed through the grave. So, Christ saves the who commit themselves to him from perishing, with all the unknown mystery that word implies.

It does more than this. If a pardon was issued to a convict who was lying in prison under sentence of death, it would benefit him but little if he were the victim of a fatal disease, or had uneducated propensities that would bring him back to the condemned cell in a short time, with a new crime on his conscience. To make the pardon a blessing to him, he must have physical and moral cure, in addition. The sinner saved from perdition, has a similar need. He needs to be saved from the corruption of sin, which is working in him being like a leprosy and from the propensity to sin, which would bring him into bondage again after being liberated. His salvation is placed within his reach through Christ. He can now enter on the task of working out his own salvation with some prospect of success. Power is at his disposal which will save him from sin.

A newly converted soul realizes what has taken place in him and how his salvation from perdition has come to him. He begins to understand the nobility of his sacrifice. He perceives that he has been saved by a love of inconceivable intensity and that he must have been saved for a purpose. God exercises no compulsion upon him, but in many ways beckons him and incites him to make effort to rise out of his environment. Though his physical nature he is allied to the brute creation and he may live like a brute: but he begins to understand that there are possibilities in his being of something higher. He has been brought into a tender association with Christ and a new ideal has entered his life. To be like Christ is to be the highest type of man. In a feeble, faltering way he begins to give up his sins. There may have been spasmodic efforts in that direction before, but as he makes firm now there is a strange new power of alliance with the superior part of his nature. The love that brought Christ to this rescue is working with him. He is being wooed away from sin, is getting free that sin degrades him. There is a new life in him reaching upward, and the light of Righteousness is shining down on his young growth and drawing it as the sun draws the shoots of the young plant. Christ is saving him from his lower nature, slowly and often with many relapses the struggle goes on. At first to outward things his life does not materially differ from his life before conversion; but within there is a change. Before, he followed sin naturally and willingly, now he resists it. If he yields, it is after a struggle and falls occasions sorrow. When he sins, he does the thing that he would not. He is actually the new nature gains power. It tastes the sweets of victory. He learns of the indulgence of his lower nature does not give him the happiness that he receives from its repression. He feels that is rising to a higher plane. Christ is saving him from selfishness, from animal nature, and is helping him in all his conflicts.

"TRUST THYSELF TO JESUS."

O, TRUST thyself to Jesus.
 When conscious of thy sin,
 Of its heavy weight upon thee,
 Of its mighty power within.
 Then is the hour for pleading
 His finished work for thee,
 Then is the time for singing,
 His blood was shed for me.

O, trust thyself to Jesus.
 When daily cares perplex
 And trifles seem to gain a power
 Thy inmost soul to vex;
 Then is the hour for grasping
 His hand, who walked the sea,
 Then is the time for singing,
 He makes it calm for me.

O, trust thyself to Jesus,
 In days of feebleness,
 When thou canst only dumbly feel
 Thy utter helplessness.
 Then is the hour for proving
 His mighty power in thee,
 Then is the time for singing,
 His grace sufficeth me.

O, trust thyself to Jesus,
 When thou art full of care
 For wanderers, whom thou canst not win.
 Our blessed hope to share
 Then is the hour for trusting
 Thy Lord to bring them nigh.
 Then is the time for singing,
 He loves them more than I.

O, trust thyself to Jesus,
 When loved ones pass away,
 When very lonely seems thy life
 And very dark thy way.
 Then is the hour for yielding Entirely to his will.
 Then is the time for singing,
 I have my Saviour still.

O, trust thyself to Jesus,
 As thy spirit takes its flight,
 From every earthly shadow
 To the land of perfect light.
 Then is the hour for feeling
 Christ has done all for me.
 Then is the time for singing,
 He gives the victory.

THE PRESENT AGE.

Characteristics of Our Time by which we Recognize its Place in Prophecy.

BY REV. GEORGE C. NEEDHAM.*

THE term "age" refers to the moral rather than the physical world. An "age" marks an historical cycle whose characteristics are so well defined and diverse from the characteristics of other periods, as to prominently distinguish it. Thus Scripture reveals a succession of these ages from Adam onward to eternity, each stamped with individual features, and hedged in by limitations of its own.

The New Testament is chiefly devoted to the unfolding of two of these ages: that one which began with Christ's crucifixion and is now in progress, and the other one which shall begin in connection with his assumption of rule as King of kings. We call these "the present age," and "the Millennial age."

Now, great confusion has arisen from the mistake of confounding these ages, and mingling their characteristics. Thus their limitations have been obliterated, and they have been merged into one; till in the minds of some, the whole future lies before them like a vast, unfenced prairie, without trees, hedges, or landmarks of any kind to designate boundary or ownership.

These two ages are prophetic of one another, and complementary the one to the other, even as in music or in painting, sounds and color have their own dependent accessories.

1. A worldly age. Jesus compares the days of the period before his advent to the days that were before the flood, and to the days of Sodom. The people then were solely occupied with selfish pursuits—eating, drinking, marrying, buying, selling, planting, building (Luke 17: 26, 30).

Our Lord did not intend to teach that it was essentially wrong to eat, drink, and marry. But he sought to show that indifference characterized that former age. Had the antediluvians believed a flood was coming; and had they taken in the fact that it was coming because wickedness was so prevalent, they would have been too serious and terrified to become wholly absorbed in the pursuits of commerce or pleasure. Like the Ninevites they would have girded themselves with sackcloth, seeking by repentance to call out the mercy of the Almighty. Their worldly attitude thus demonstrated their unbelief. And the parallel is precisely this: The end of this age is sketched with the terrors that shall accompany the second Advent. Men and women laugh at it, and because they discredit it they go on about their ordinary pursuits, throwing coming judgment out of the account and planning for a long continuation of the present state of affairs.

Now on the contrary, how does the true expectation of the Lord's coming affect men? Why just in proportion as it is apprehended, it makes them unworldly. They look for the dissolution of things temporal. If they marry, if they feast, if they plant, if they build, they do all in godly fear, as stewards whose account may be required at any time.

Thus it is with the promised advent of the Lord. Chronologies have been outlined for the Jewish nation; but only spiritual signs are appointed for the church. Therefore, be ye also ready: for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh (Matt. 24: 42-44). Thus he implied that he himself knew, that a divine programme was arranged, but the disciples were not to know, and not to ask to know.

2. It will remain a scoffing age. The Apostle Peter declares (II. Peter 3: 4-7), "there shall come in the last days scoffers" whose sneers and jeers are specially aimed at the promises concerning the Lord's return. Untruthfulness will mark such scoffers. The boast that "all things continue as they were from the beginning of creation," proves them false to history. They are willingly ignorant, or rather willfully forget, that the first world created was overflowed with water, and so there was an interruption to the material earth in its course from the beginning.

HEROIC PERSONALITIES

By REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

Saint Content Wintergreen.

CONTENT Wintergreen has come to her sainthood through what most people would call great tribulation, though she herself never thinks of it as such, and never dreams that anything she has done would look heroic in the eyes of anyone. And yet, to my mind, she is a heroine of the most Christian type. Perhaps many who look on the wrinkled face disclosed in her photograph will say that I must have been hard pressed for heroines to have taken up a picture like that. But, I think, if you will listen to my story, you will agree with me that there is something sweet and divinely beautiful in the very homeliness and irregularity of these features, and that every wrinkle on her brow is an added wreath in her crown of glory, that diadem which shall never fade away.

Content Wintergreen was born seventy-nine years ago in a little town in Central New York. When only a girl her mother died, and her father brought his family of three girls and a boy to try their fortunes in the then small city of Brooklyn. Sixty years ago, while still but a girl, Content Wintergreen found the source of all true contentment in a sweet fellowship with Jesus Christ.

The family were poor, and the girls early sought to help bear the burdens of the household by working in a tailor's shop or bringing their work home, as Content did after awhile when the father was ill. One of the sisters married and went away to enjoy the happiness of her own home and family, but as the other sister soon lost her health, Content had no time to think of love affairs, save to care for the loved ones of her own household. The brother had grown up and gone West, and on Content's frail shoulders fell all the burden of the home.

The father died soon afterwards, and though that wrung her heart, she had not time for morbid grief, for there was her invalid sister to provide for still. For fourteen years she wrought with her needle and earned enough to care for them both, and ministered with a mother's love and tenderness to her sick companion who was never able to go beyond the door of their humble room.

During the last and most trying year of her sister's illness, a letter came from the brother in the far West, telling the sad news that he had been struck by a fatal disease and longed to come home and die in the arms of some one who loved him. There was no moment's hesitation. Content thought of the blue-eyed brother who had been the playmate of her childhood, and in a most loving letter bade him come. Toes made three months to feed instead of two, and a double burden of nursing, but said Content, the other day, as she told me her story: "Those were very happy days after all. Though we were poor, we loved each other and were so happy together." The brother, after a few months, passed away, and only a little later the sister, too, faded out of life.

"The only time I was ever tempted to murmur," said Content to me with a wistful face, and I knew by the far-away look in her eyes that a picture of other days was passing before her inner vision, "was when my sister died. It was hard work, the working all day and the being up, much nursing her in the night, but love made it light, and I had cared for her so long, that I think I felt about her as a mother does for a crippled child."

During all these years of toil and nursing her sick, Content Wintergreen never for a moment thought of excusing herself from Christian work. For forty years she was one of the most persevering and successful tract distributors that Brooklyn has ever known. She could not go to church much, and seldom had time to seek out any one to talk with them, but she never allowed herself to go out of the room to the tailor's shop, or to the grocer's, or to the market, without her little bundle of tracts, which with gentleness and skill she gave out here and there with a kindly word of good cheer that made them welcome. Many a home among the poor was sweetened by the little visitor carried home from the market-place. In this way Content Wintergreen introduced her divine Lord and Master, whom she loved so well and served so faithfully, to scores and hundreds of people.

For a long time now Content has lived alone, and on her next birthday she will have reached her four score years. She is not able to work much now, and a kind relative pays her room rent, and allows her four dollars a month for living expenses. Out of that four dollars a month she provides her provision and fuel and clothing, and lives in peace with God and man. If she was a government officer, pensioned by the government in most generous style, she could not be happier or more grateful to God and her friends. To anyone who goes in to talk with her she never utters a word of complaint. Her talk is all about the goodness and mercy of God, and the abundance of his blessings to her. Neither has she lost her desire to be a worker for Christ in her old age. A young friend who takes an interest in her had been for a long time taking her the newspapers to read, and on one occasion, desiring a paper in which to wrap a parcel, said to her, "Auntie Wintergreen, what becomes of all the papers I bring, you never seem to have any about here?" The dear old saint flushed red like a school girl caught whispering, and stammered out, "I hope you won't mind, but I save the papers up, and every two weeks I take them down to the jail. I thought I might perhaps do a little good yet, in that way."

Now won't you please glance back again at the worn and wrinkled features of Content Wintergreen. I think it will look sweeter since you know its story. The face is wrinkled and worn, but the soul is flushed with immortal youth, and some of these days in the resurrection glory it will be a beautiful face to look upon. It shall glow forever with the peace of him whom having not seen she loves.

The University Settlement.

At the recent annual meeting of the University Settlement Society in New York it was announced that the debt of the society had been reduced to $2,770, and the building fund for a suitable edifice raised to $50,000, adding that the council would buy property for building purposes when $30,000 had been added to that sum.

Home Talks with Mothers and Daughters.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

WHEN LOVE AWAKES.

O father and mother, it is often something very like a shock to discover that their children have sufficiently advanced on the journey of life to fall in love. Parents do not always realize that their young people stand precisely where they did themselves, in years gone by. The thing seems strange and almost new in their eyes, this stirring of the heart toward others, than the brothers and sisters in the home nest. Fathers are a little jealous of the men who capture the affections of their daughter's affections; mothers regard the wooer with suspicion, and the path of true love does not run through roses and lilies, but across a rough and turbulent stream, thickly strewn with rocks and boulders.

When this combines with other circumstances and conditions to make the period of courtship a rather exciting phase in life, the position as a rule strengthening young people in their determination, so that many a match is precipitated by the injustice of protests of parents and friends.

From the outset, people are apt to make mistakes about the feeling of boys and girls toward one another, and to put the sexes in wrong relations. Talk about beaux and heartbreaks sometimes begins in the home, so that even small children are made shy and self-conscious, long before they should be the slightest intimation of what will be the dawn of love. Particularly prone are short-sighted parents to pry and comment upon, either with a well-natured laugh, or an ill-natured frown, the earliest signs that a lad shows when he becomes aware of the lassies, O! what if Guy does buy a pretty valentine and send it to Louise? It is a graceless courtesy on his part; it does no harm, it may give pleasure to the pretty girl recipient? The dawning of a young man's attention, and of woman's favor, is a rarely beautiful thing to see, and we are apt to rush in upon it with our interference and our frowns and spoil it forever.

Do I remember my own first valentine? I went, blessed be the kindly fate, to present me there in early childhood, to the little district school in the country, on the side of the low-ceiled room were the desks of the boys; across the aisle, benches for recitation between, were the girls. It was such a school as Whittier described in his poem, beginning:

It sits the school-house by the road,
A ragged beggar sunning;
Round it still the sumacs grow,
And blackberry vines are running.
Within, the master's desk is seen,
Deep scarred by raps official;
The warping floor, the battered seats,
The jack-knife's carved initial.

It was only eight and my brave boy was possibly ten years old, brought me red-cheeked apples from his father's farm, and carried my gun and gave me rides on his sled, and he sent me a valentine, a funny thing with hearts and darts and crude drawings about loves and doves and violets. Sugar is sweet and so are you, and I for a book-mark for several weeks, harm was done. The boy's name was Ezekiah, and whatever became of him I don't know, for the idyl of the district school soon floated away, and I went to a beautiful higher seminary for young ladies into which boys were not admitted.

It is certainly a good deal to be said in favor of co-education, at least, for some of the children's school life. Sentiment does not obtrude itself to an alarm extent, where girls and boys are obliged to sit together, to stumble together through algebra and logic, to meet in the lists of as competitors on equal terms. Happily, the customs of our own day, bring young people not only into daily acquaintanceship in study, but also in sport, and the wheeling, and golfing, and playing tennis, and engaging in other active outdoor recreations are wholesome and sensible, and can produce nothing but good, if not carried to excess.

When love awakes, if the mind and heart are pure, if the body has been respected as a hallowed temple, then it is a very sacred and benign experience which comes to the young. Here, let no alien foot profane the place—it is holy ground. Alas! for those who have so indulged in coquetry and flirtation and spurious sentiment, that first love in their lives has suffered a wrong.

In the meantime, before love awakes, let there be friendship. Let everything be open and above board. Have no concealments. The family sitting-room, with parents present, is the best and safest and happiest rendezvous for the young people who enjoy each other's society none the less than older people enter into the pleasure of the moment.

May I add that there should be similarity of tastes, social training on the same plane, and full sympathy in the religious life, to make youthful love a happy and blessed experience? "No man," said a wise friend of mine, "need expect happiness, if he fall in love with a heathen girl." And no girl should trust herself to a professed unbeliever.

TO CHRISTIAN WRITERS.

Desiring to secure a religious story of superior merit, we offer ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS in Cash for the best MS. submitted to us before Sept. 1, 1897, and FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS for the second best MS., each to be from 60,000 to 65,000 words in length.

PURPOSE OF THE BOOK.—It is customary for Sunday-school teachers and officers to make gifts to their scholars at the Christmas season. This Company aims each year to take advantage of this by offering them, for the purpose, a book of superior attractiveness and merit—one that will be unrivalled as a gift and which will prove a powerful factor in elevating and molding the heart and life of the reader. Of "Titus," our Christmas book for 1894, there have now been sold nearly one million copies. "The Wrestler of Philippi," published for the holidays of 1896, has had a very large sale. The $1000.00 book accepted we shall bring out for 1897. The $500.00 book, if one of sufficient merit is secured, will be published for the season of 1898.

REQUIREMENTS.—We believe that Jesus lived and taught a life which, rightly discerned, would mean a hundredfold more of true happiness and glory here and now, than a life of mere seeking for wealth, honor, or human friendships. We believe that He desired—as we know He prayed for—a union with us, His Father, and that He offered and does offer a complete and perfect gift of Himself to all who will receive Him—a real and present friendship and companionship, such as alone can call forth the entire love of the human heart, soul, mind and strength. It is not the physical frame that we love, but the soul shining through. One may receive a true mental picture of God through rightly studying the life of God in the flesh—thus coming to know Him and love Him as we realize His unchanging nature and respond to His spirit within us—and so may enter a life of union with Him. The book should help the reader to the best conception of this life and true living of it. It will be judged upon its literary merits and forcefulness for this purpose. The widest liberty will be given writers as to plot.

THE PLAN.—Each MS. will be given a number. A receipt will be sent to the author, stating the number assigned. All MSS. will be submitted (without authors' names) to three competent judges. Judges will not be asked to examine MS. written in pencil or otherwise improperly prepared. Payment will be made for the best two books received, without reserve, on completion of examination and not later than October 30, 1897.

WHY UNDERTAKE WRITING.—There is seldom such an opportunity offered a writer for both usefulness and gaining wider reputation. Few religious story books reach a sale of more than five or six thousand. We can insure a sale of at least half a million. With such an incentive and purpose you should find greater inspiration in writing. If your book is not considered the best, or second best, you will still have as good a chance as otherwise of selling it to some other publisher—and most books are written and a publisher afterwards sought. LIKE A BIRD.

(Prov. 27: 8; Isa. 16: 2.)

LIKE a wandering bird that is cast from her nest,
So my soul had no rest.
I was storm-driven over the land and the sea,
Far away from my mountain to which I would flee;
Not a rock for my refuge, no bower, nor tree:
But impelled, Lord, to thee
I found peace on thy breast.

(Prov. 7: 23; Ps. 124: 7.)

Like an innocent bird for whose feet a meshed net
By the fowler is set,
So, un mindful of danger, suspecting no snare
I was flitting about like a bird in the air
Till my feet were entangled and I in despair,
But my Saviour was there
And he broke the meshed net.

(Song of Sol. 2: 11-13.)

Like the singing so sweet of the birds in the spring
As they flit on glad wing
Over meadow and valley, by bower and dell,
A great organ of nature with wide open swell,
So my heart in its freedom is under the spell
Of such joys as compel
Me to blissfully sing.

A Forbidden Tree.

The story of the Garden, and also the lines of Milton, the poet, when he sung

Of that forbidden tree whose mortal taste
Brought sin into the world and all our woe, are strangely recalled by a remarkable tree that has lately been added to the collection of plants in the Botanical Gardens of Madras, India. It is known as the "Stinging Tree," and is surrounded by a stout railing, which bears a placard inscribed: "Dangerous—all persons are forbidden to touch the leaves or branches of this tree." The plant within the enclosure is thus described: "It is a forbidden tree, but no one is tempted to touch it, for it is known to be a burning tree. The tree stings rather than burns, however. Beneath the leaves there are stings comparable to those of nettles, which, when touched, pierce the skin and secrete a fluid which certainly has a burning effect. The sting leaves no outward sign, but the sensation of pain persists sometimes for months, and is especially keen on damp days, or when the place which has been wounded is plunged in water. The natives in Burma, where this tree grows, are in such terror of it that they fly in haste when they perceive the peculiar odor which it exhales. If they happen to touch it, they fall on the ground and roll over and over on the earth with shrieks. Dogs touched by it yelp and run, biting and tearing the part of their bodies which has been touched. A horse which had come in contact with it ran like a mad thing, biting everything and everybody that it could reach. A missionary at Mandalay, who investigated a leaf of the plant with his forefinger, suffered agony for several weeks, and for ten months felt occasional darting pains in his finger."

White Ribbon Conventions.

The programme for next autumn's White Ribbon Conventions has been definitely arranged, and these meetings will be held as follows: The Dominion convention will be held in Toronto, Canada, October 20th to 22d; the World's will open on the 23d and continue through the evening of the 26th at the same place; the National will meet in Buttrick, beginning Friday, October the 29th, and continuing through November 3d. These are not mass conventions, like those of most philanthropic societies, but are on the basis of one delegate for every one thousand members.

A Prominent Physician Writes.

SPOTSWOOD, N. J., Aug. 3, 1896.
MESSRS. McKesson & Robbins:
Dear Sirs:—Please send me, by mail, four more bottles of Tartarilithine Tablets (100 each.)

I will also here state, in justice, that this is the most welcome remedy that has come into my hands since my beginning of the practice of medicine. It has given me, in every case of rheumatism in which I have used it, the happiest kind of results. I have used discretion, perhaps even more than necessary, in its employment; that it be given to patients whom I believed required such a remedy or preparation; but these are just the kind that refuse to yield to ordinary treatment, old chronic cases of gouty diathesis, where there is a tendency to calcareous deposits, etc. These are undoubtedly, or have been, at least to me, the most troublesome patients in my practice to give what might fairly be termed good results. Now these have been the very kind in which I have been using Tartarilithine with the very happiest results to patients and myself. Many valuable remedies come daily to our aid, but this has been the most welcome one to me thus far.

Yours very truly,

How many words do you think you can correctly spell with the letters in the word "MANUFACTURERS"? Using each letter as desired, but not more times than it appears in Manufacturers. Prefixes, suffixes, proper nouns, obsolete and foreign words not allowed. Work it out as follows: Am, Can, Cans, Cures, Rum, Same, Each, Fact, Frigate, Manufacturers, etc. Words spelled alike but having different meanings count as one.

Our Offer.—We will pay $100 for the largest list, $50 for the second largest, $25 for the third, $10 each for the next five, $5 each for the next ten and $1 each for the next twenty-five. That is to say we will divide among forty-three contestants the aggregate sum of $300 according to merit. Don't you think you could be one of the forty-three? TRY IT.

Our Purpose.—The above rewards for mental effort are given free and without consideration for the purpose of attracting attention to MODES, by May Mantion, the most popular up-to-date Fashion Magazine in the world. Its 36 pages, replete with beautiful illustrations of the latest styles in ladies', misses' and children's garments, make it a real necessity in every household: the Designs and Fashion Hints, being by May Mantion, render it invaluable as an absolutely reliable Fashion Guide.

Our Conditions.—You must send with your list of words 25 cents (stamps or silver) for a Three Months' Trial Subscription to MODES.

Our Extra Inducement.—Every person sending 25 cents and a list of 15 words or more, will, in addition to three months' subscription, receive by return mail a pattern of this stylish basque No. 6995 illustrated above, in any size from 32 to 40 inches.

Our Aim.—The present monthly circulation of MODES exceeds 100,000. We aim to make it 200,000. This contest will close March 15th next so the names of successful spellers may be published in the following issue of MODES, but SEND IN YOUR LIST AT ONCE. For our responsibility we refer you to any Mercantile Agency. Address—

SHELBY, N. C.—For 18 years I had Catarrh, was very deaf and fully restored my hearing in 1892, and it is still perfect.

Mrs. J. Bastick.

For many years I suffered from which destroyed my hearing, and for five years I was so deaf that I could not hear a clock strike by holding my ear again. I had tried every known remedy, and it gave me the slightest relief. I obtained Moore's treatment, and in three weeks hearing began to improve, and now I can have a common conversation across a room; I can hear a clock strike in an adjoining room; I can hear a watch tick in my ear; I am entirely cured, and my hearing permanently restored. ARMENIA'S ORPHANS.

ALTHOUGH the horrors of massacre and famine have been arrested in Armenia, and the condition of the unfortunate sufferers has been greatly improved through the generous aid afforded by the Christian people of Europe and America, the present winter is proving a very severe one in many districts. All that can be done in the way of relief is being faithfully performed by the missionaries, who have wisely economized the funds placed in their hands for the purpose, knowing that the time of the greatest suffering would come in winter. The Harpoot district alone, 21,706 Armenians have been aided; Palu district, 157 aided; Coarsandjak, 8,291; Arabkir, 6,151; Egin, 2,543; Malatia, 7,738; Bakur, 9,989; Chemish-yuzek, 2,543; Harbekir district, 30,000; and Cesarea, Peroum, Oorfa, Van, and other cities in proportion. The greatest need of orphan aid is at Oorfa, Malatia, Arabkir and Egin. During the present week, another remittance of $1,000 has been sent to Oorfa through the American Board, for the relief work among the Armenian orphans in that city, in special charge of Miss Shattuck, an American missionary. This is the third remittance made from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Armenian Relief Fund for the special purpose, and together with previous remittances and disbursements, makes a total of $55,000 expended by the Fund in relief work up to the present time.

The old man I fitted 2 years ago wore your truss about 90 days and said he was cured. Saw him last week and although he was 63 years old and a hard worker, he is as sound as when a boy.

I have had splendid result from your truss in quite a number of cases of grown people.

I received my truss the 27th and since I have had it have taken more comfort with it than I ever have had. The last day I got it I put it on and moved grass all day and I never noticed that I had it on me.

About 3 years ago I bought one of your trusses. I wore it about 6 months and it has made a fine cure. Was badly ruptured. I then to you about this before but did not want to see if my cure was permanent.

A Soul-Winning Countess.

Readers of this journal are already familiar to a considerable extent, with the remarkable gospel labors of Adeline, Countess Schimmelmänn, among the fishermen and sailors of the islands and seas of the Baltic. In a letter on the subject, The Kingdom gives these facts concerning her experiences: She passed one winter in Berlin to raise funds for her enterprise, and did much work there among the unemployed. She gives this experience of bread-riot:

Never before had I seen such a brutal selfishness and never before had I felt such a burning pity. My soul was so filled with compassion that I felt no place for fear. * * * In that moment I understood that it was that the martyrs had died without fear. On her way home she passed the royal palace which had so long been the centre of her life. The windows were lit up, and a ball was in progress. And all those fashionable people know as the needs of their poor brethren of their duty towards them as I in the earlier days? * * * I had just the prophecy of the trouble which ignorance or indifference might some bring upon them.

She has now extended her work and founded a general international mission to Baltic seamen. She makes her home upon the yacht, the Duen, and in it she goes from port to port. She has recently held meetings at Hamburg and Great Yarmouth. She believes that her mission is only to fishermen and sailors but "to the distressed and troubled elements of society everywhere."

OUR CHILDREN'S HOME

Mont-Lawn, Nyack-on-the-Hudson, N. Y.

Conducted under the auspices of The Christian Herald.

LIVES over 2,000 neglected "Slum Children" a ten days' outing every summer. Over 200 beds, chapel, room, dining-hall, school-room, baths, and 70 acres of grounds. Matron and 70 of caretakers and medical attendant. Regular religious services held.

300 tenement children received, sheltered, taught, and (in many instances) clad at Mont-Lawn last summer at an average cost $3 per head, including transportation.

This beautiful Charity costs annually between $7,000 and $8,000 for its support. Pays for a ten days' mid-summer-out for three children.

We are Anxious for a Name

Worthy of this SUPERB NEW PEA ("1897")

And will Pay for it in Cash $200.00

Because we are certain that the "1897" will attain, among garden Peas, the highest possible rank, we have decided to offer a prize of $200.00 for the name sent in this year that we shall consider the most appropriate for the variety. Purchasers of the Pea who intend to suggest a name should read CONDITIONS OF COMPETITION. Every package of "1897" Pea contains a coupon with blank space for name suggested, also for competitor's name and address, so that all purchasers of the Pea are entitled to fill out just as many coupons as their order calls for packages. Coupons may be returned to us any time throughout the season, but not later than October 1, 1897. The prize money to be remitted by us during December, 1897.

DESCRIPTION OF HENDERSON'S NEW "1897" PEA

The ideal garden Pea should combine extreme earliness, quantity and quality. We have long had many varieties that possessed one, and often two, of these most essential characteristics, but until the advent of our "1897" none that possessed all three, and what is more wonderful still, that it should have all these features in the superlative degree. We have grown it in our Trial Grounds for the last two seasons, and find in earliness and yield it leaves nothing to be desired, while its delicious flavor is such that that epicure would indeed be hard to please whom it failed to satisfy. Our Catalogue, offered below, describes it in more extended detail.

Henderson's "1897" Pea will be delivered free to any Post-Office in the United States, at following prices (when more convenient buyers may remit in stamps), 20 cents per package; 3 packages for 50 cents; 7 packages for $1.00. (Every package containing a coupon as stated above.)

NOW THEN about "JUBILEE" CATALOGUE which we will send FREE

With every order from this advertisement. Every copy of our "Jubilee" Catalogue of "Everything for the Garden" costs 25 cents to produce, but with every order from this advertisement for "1897" Pea we will send a copy without charge. Prepared to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of our business, scores among the thousands who have already seen it have told us that it is the most beautiful and interesting Seed and Plant Catalogue ever issued. It is a magnificent work of 170 pages, on which are displayed over 500 illustrations of the principal products of our Gardens and Greenhouses. Also 6 full-sized colored plates, which in artistic beauty have probably never been equaled. FINALLY—we bring this most liberal of offers to a close when we promise never to surpass. To send our "Jubilee Surprise Souvenir" without charge to all who, in ordering from this advertisement, will state they saw it in this publication.

$500 FOR A TOMATO

The Engraving shows the most wonderful Tomato ever offered, which was grown by W. M. Finley, Salem, Ill., who writes: "They grew over 7 ft. high, and I began to pick ripe tomatoes June 21, and had an abundance all summer. Was two weeks earlier than any other variety I ever had, and of the best quality. I had plants, and each one produced from 1 to 2 bushels of nice fruit, many mammoth ones, not a poor one the whole season, and Oct. 15 was still loaded with ripe and green fruit."

This Giant Everbearing Tomato is entirely new and a wonder to all. Ait once grown you will have no others. We own all the seed there is, and will pay $500 for 1 of them weighing 3 lbs. Plant some, you may get the 3 lb. tomato. Instructions will be sent with the seed.

BARGAIN IN BRAINS! "HURT" BOOKS AT LITTLE PRICES

POSITIVELY LIMITED TO THE SMALL STOCK NOW ON HAND.

On December 24, 1896, prices of the only genuine, complete and thoroughly revised edition of The Encyclopaedic Dictionary were restored to regular rates, viz.: Cloth Style, $42.00 a set; Half-Russia, $52.50; Full Sheep, $60.00; Full Morocco, $70.00. These are now the regular prices for the only authentic and complete edition, published solely by ourselves.

In making our annual inventory we have found on hand a few sets that are very slightly damaged on the covers only—a rub here, a scratch there—hardly worth mentioning, but just enough to prevent their shipment at full prices. We guarantee that the interiors are perfect. For all practical purposes these sets are precisely the same as new; but they are now offered to the earliest applicants at and on the easiest possible terms of payment. This special limited offer deserves the immediate attention of every reader who, although needing a modern reference book of the highest class, has failed to take advantage of our recent Introductory Offer, or has been beguiled into buying an inferior imitation work of comparative little value.

Four massive volumes, each 9 in. wide, 11 1/2 in. long, 5 in. thick, containing 5,359 pages, 16,000 columns of clear type matter, 3,600 illustrations; 250,000 words defined, 50,000 encyclopaedic topics. Weight of set, about 40 lbs.

THIS HANDSOME BOOK CASE FREE OF CHARGE.

JUST AS THEY LOOK.

MAKE NO MISTAKE

These special sets are made from our very latest edition of last November (1896), and contain all the new words, phrases and definitions of 1896, the most recent inventions, discoveries and explorations, and scores of handsome new engravings in monotone, besides the while the small stock of special sets remain, but forever thereafter it will cost from $42.00 to $70.00 to possess this matchless home library of general reference.

YOU KNOW THESE GENTLEMEN—READ!

RT. REV. OZI W. WHITAKER, Bishop of Pennsylvania: "Your dictionary is what its title indicates—an encyclopaedia and a dictionary in one. Its definitions and summaries are sufficiently complete. I know of no other work which furnishes so much information within so limited a space."

REV. DR. CYRUS D. FOSS, Bishop of M.E. Church: "It does wonderfully well the double duty of a dictionary and an encyclopaedia. I could wish I might have had, from my boyhood, such a valuable thesaurus of immense knowledge, made instantly accessible. Parents could do their bright boys and girls no greater service than by putting this treasure before them and teaching them to use it."

REV. RUSSELL H. CONWELL, D. D.: "The Encyclopaedic Dictionary has been placed in our Institution (Temple College), and is especially helpful in our educational work. Students will find it a great saving of time, books and money. It is a clear condensation from great fields of learning—in my opinion the best of its kind—and is a fit blossom of this practical age."

REV. DR. CHAS. H. PARKHURST: "The Encyclopaedic Dictionary is a library condensed into four volumes; a ton of diffusiveness reduced to 40 lbs. of quintessence, and as delicate in detail as it is comprehensive in contents."

COST $750,000—YOURS TO-DAY AT HALF PRICE AND ON EASY TERMS

IT IS AN INVALUABLE REFERENCE WORK, containing satisfactory and up-to-date encyclopaedic treatment of such important topics of to-day as the following: Battleship, Bimetallism, Money, Wages, Germ Theory, Arctic Explorations, Tariff, Christian Endeavor, Appendicitis, Shadow Photography, Electrocution, X-rays, Vitascope, Steam Navigation, and hundreds of others.

IT IS ONE OF THE LATEST AND BEST DICTIONARIES of our language. Each legitimate English word is exhaustively treated as to its origin, history, development, spelling, pronunciation, and various meanings.

IT IS A CONCISE ENCYCLOPÆDIA of anatomy, botany, chemistry, zoology, geology, art, music, philosophy, mathematics, mechanics, theology, biblical research, etc. 50,000 separate encyclopaedic subjects, including the latest inventions and discoveries, tersely treated by educators of vast renown.

IT IS A SUPERB LIBRARY BOOK, printed on high grade white paper, from plates never before on press, durably bound, and containing the most superb illustrations, in 17 colors and in monotone, ever made for any reference work.

IT IS BETTER THAN OTHER DICTIONARIES, because it is the latest and most complete, containing nearly twice as many words as are in the largest "unabridged," and treating 20,000 more encyclopaedic subjects than are covered by other cyclopaedias costing from $50 to $200.

Book of 100 Specimen Pages and Illustrations Mailed Free on Receipt of 2c. Stamp.

HOW TO ORDER. Send $1.00 and the four handsome volumes will be forwarded. Subsequent payments are made as follows: Cloth binding, $1.50 per month for one year; Half-Russia binding, $2.00 per month, and Full Sheep binding, $2.50 per month. First payment in any case is only One Dollar. To cash buyers we allow a discount of 10 per cent, and furnish the book case free of charge; otherwise the book cases cost $1.50, which must be paid in advance. This allowance represents cost of keeping monthly payment accounts. We recommend Half-Russia binding as the most serviceable. When ordering be sure to mention style binding wanted. All transportation charges must be paid by purchasers. We refer to any Commercial Agency, Newspaper, or Bank in Philadelphia. AGENTS WANTED. (Mention this paper.)

Books Guaranteed as Represented or Money Refunded if Returned in Ten Days.

CAUTION! Beware of imitators who have copied our methods of advertising, even to the wording, and are offering various ancient publications, slightly revamped and under new titles, as new and original works. The genuine Encyclopaedic Dictionary is complete in four volumes, with 5,359 pages. We can be responsible for no orders except those sent directly to us.

SYNDICATE PUBLISHING CO., 234 So. Eighth St., Philadelphia.

REMEMBER

These special sets are precisely as good, for all practical purposes, as those for which you now pay $42.00 a set and upward. They look just as well in your book-case. The most serious damage to any set is no greater than might occur in a few days' use.

Questions and Answers.

A. S. A., Huron, Cal. 1. Are warnings ever given now in dreams or visions? 2. Is there any harm in writing a letter on Sunday to a friend?

1. There have been strange coincidences which many have taken to be warnings in dreams, but they are so vague and so unreliable that sensible people disregard them. 2. You might be better employed on the Lord's Day than in writing letters. Considering how important the soul's interests are and how short is the time that in the busy week can be devoted to them, the Christian should use the Lord's Day for the purpose and exclude from it all that might distract his attention. There may be circumstances in which it would be justifiable to write a letter on a Sunday, but the urgency ought to be very pressing before the precious time should be spent in that way.

R. O. M. M., Saugerties, N. Y. 1. Is it right to hold fairs in churches? 2. Do you think it is right to have a stage in a church on which Christians appear in changeable costumes, charging admission at the door for the same? 3. Will a church be blessed in such work?

1. Church fairs are a species of amusement usually productive of anything but spiritual benefit. If held at all, they are better held somewhere else than in the church building. 2. No. 3. We should hardly expect it.

D. W. Conard, Marseilles, Ill. 1. Is the orthodox belief true that the great and good men of the past, such as Socrates, who had no opportunity of hearing the truth, as we believe it, are in endless tortures? 2. Will not the thought that some of their dear friends are in unspeakable misery affect the happiness of some who are saved?

1. Do you not think God will act justly toward all men? Why are you anxious to settle the fate of these men? Our duty is to accept the offer of salvation that is made to us, and to leave to God, who is not only just, but loving and merciful, the responsibility of dealing with men who might have accepted the offer of salvation if it had ever been made to them. Christ said (Luke 12:48), that any man who did not know his Lord's will, and did things worthy of stripes, should be beaten with few stripes. This should relieve us of solicitude on their account. God has not revealed their fate to us—it was not necessary—but we know him and are sure he will do right. 2. We do not think that anything will mar the happiness of the denizens of heaven. The firm conviction that God is doing right will fill the soul, and there will be no murmuring at his decisions. The practical, present duty is to seek by every means in our power the salvation of our living relatives and friends, and to leave the future world, about which we necessarily know so little, in the hands of our loving Father.

Bird-lovers will be interested in the following letter from a reader in Turney, Mo.:

I noticed an article in a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on "The Small Boy and Birds," which had the correct ring. I have never worn birds or bird's wings on a hat, but wore ostrich tips until I read an article describing the manner of procuring them, which stated how painful it was. I do not know whether it is painful or not, should like to hear from some one who knows. However I thought I would be on the safe side in discarding them. They also cost more than some other trimmings, and the heathen may profit thereby, if we will. Dear sisters, do not think because you do not kill the birds, you may innocently wear them. If none were worn, there would be many less killed. Do not say, "Oh, I am only one, it will not make any difference whether I wear them or not."

What fair bird you had adorning,
Have you ever thought, my sister,
How the helpless ones suffered,
When, through death, for you they missed her?

HERALD Reader, Philadelphia. Would it be right and proper for a young lady, a member of a Protestant church and a Christian family, to keep company with a young man who is a strict Catholic? Would it be safe for her to marry such a person, against the wishes of her parents, although the young man may have a good moral character?

Marriages between two persons of different religious beliefs are ill-advised and invariably unhappy. We should venture the assertion that the man or woman who deliberately takes such a step invites a lifetime of trouble and regret. This will be doubly so, should children follow the union, as there will then come a time when, at "the parting of the ways," in a religious sense, the heart of one or both parents must be sorely tried, indeed. Even in the best aspect of the case, there is a barrier between husband and wife in such unions, which effectually shuts out all real happiness.

E. A. Bird, Fairport, Mo. I hear that Pastor C. H. Spurgeon withdrew from the Baptist denomination in his late years; to what religious denomination did he belong?

He was a Baptist until his death. He never wavered in his fidelity to Baptist principles. He withdrew from the Association of Baptist Ministers and Churches, which is a voluntary association for united denominational work and friendly conference. He did so because the leaders in the conference adopted views about the inspiration of the Bible, the Atonement and the Calvinistic theology which he could not endorse. They appeared to him so erroneous that he could not work harmoniously with them, or listen without pain to the sermons and addresses his ministerial brethren delivered at the Association meetings. He therefore severed his connection, but he and his church remained in the Baptist denomination.

Subscriber, Glen's Falls, N. Y. Is it possible for a man to be a true Christian and a Freemason?

The editor of this journal does not belong to any secret order, so he is not in a position resulted in our work being investigated by committees from seven different states with the object of starting similar work. In some cases they are started and now running successfully and others will start in the near future. Thus others are induced to interest themselves in behalf of the poor, unfortunate prisoner, and to make some move that will lift him up and give him back to manhood and God.—F. H. FARR, Superintendent Home of Industry, Philadelphia.

Lottie S. S., Owego, N. Y. Will you inform me who is the present Emperor of Japan?

The Mikado is Mutsu Hito, born November 3, 1852, a most enlightened Asiatic ruler.

E. E. D., Mauston, Wis. What do you think of church members and Christian Endeavorers attending dances and balls?

They are altogether out of place at such entertainments. Those who are seeking the kingdom will keep their feet from such pleasures, and will have no share in these vanities. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has repeatedly expressed its views on the dance as a menace to morals and a most pernicious indulgence. It has never helped any one and has ruined countless thousands.

C. A., Houstonia, Mo. Who composed the words of the hymn, "Ninety and Nine"? I can imagine it was some poor, old saintly widow, with a wayward son, whom she was ever asking God to bring to her and to himself, and had faith to believe that he would hear and answer her. I never was more impressed with anything that I read than I was with the piece headed, "The Hymn that Sung Itself," in the Dec. 23d number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mr. Sankey relates that he saw the verses in a Scottish newspaper, and sang them to an improvised tune of his own composition. Afterward, a lady who had attended the services and heard the verses sung, wrote to Mr. Sankey stating that her sister, now dead, had written the hymn and enclosing several other you believe that it was miraculously produced from pure water. You must, therefore, conclude that it would be different in its nature from ordinary wines, although sufficiently them in taste to satisfy the governor of the feast. Christ certainly infused no alcohol nor any ingredients that could cause fermentation, nor was there time for fermentation. Besides which, you cannot imagine C. making in such an enormous quantity (a dried and twenty-six gallons), a drink would degrade those who drank it.

L. A. B., Harbor Springs, Mich. How can we be rewarded in heaven? If a man gains heaven what more can he wish or hope for? In what the loss or gain referred to in 1. Cor. 3:15 consist?

That there are differences in condition taught by Christ's parable of the pounds (Luke 19:17-20), and Paul says (1. Cor. 13:12) that "one star differeth from another star in glory." The nature of the difference, however, is not revealed. It may be in the service which a soul is assigned, or in rank, or in the conferred. There must be men who toiled and suffered in Christ's cause, who God will honor more than he will those who have done nothing for him, but by faith aged to get their own souls saved.

D. A. S., Shirentown, Pa. Does the prohibition against swearing (Matt. 5:34-37), at oaths in courts of justice or before a notary?

Members of the Society of Friends, the Quakers and Mennonites think so, but Christians of other churches differ with them. The general opinion of Biblical scholars is that the prohibition applies only to the profane use of swearing by some sacred name. The use of a court of justice simply calls God to witness that a man is telling the truth, or pleads himself to perform a duty.

Anxious One, Hagerstown, Md. I have been led to believe from the emphatic command in John 12:17, that we ought to wash our feet and that it should be a church ordinance. Am I right?

If among your acquaintances there is any one whose feet are washed and he is unable to render him the service, you would be in doing any other duty. But there is no need to do so ostentatiously in church, where would savor of Pharisaism. Christ had lived in Palestine in the days of Christ, when people went on dusty roads, with sandals on their feet which left the top of the foot exposed, and it was the custom for the lowest servant of the household to wash the feet of a guest, you might have shown your humility by performing the duty. But in these days, when no custom prevails, there is no need in the act. There is, however, an abundant occasion for the exercise of the spirit which Christ commanded by the act. If you are to undertake any duty for Christ's sake and in his cause, have a humble it may be; if you desire to push to the front a good honor and glory to yourself, you are willing to serve Christ with a capacity that offers, you are obeying Christ's injunction intelligently, than by slavishly following an antiquated custom which now has lost its significance, and the apostle's advice (Rom. 12:2) and serve Christ in a new spirit and not in the oldness of the letter.

THE "SACRED CITY ON KAIRWAN," NORTH AFRICA.

This City, which is the Mecca of Northern Africa, is in the regency of Tunis, and lies in an open plain. It has a population of about 15,000, and is emphatically a religious City of the Moslems, no Jew being permitted to enter it, and Christian travelers being allowed to do so only at rare intervals. The place is crowded with the tombs of Mohammedan warriors and saints, and some of the Mosques are among the finest known. Photographs of the City are very rare, as the Mohammedans have a horror of the camera.

to state of his own knowledge whether there are any obligations that a Freemason has to perform which are inconsistent with a Christian profession. He knows, however, several eminent Christians, both ministers and laymen, who are members of the Masonic Order who would not be members of it if they were required to do anything contrary to Christian principle.

Subscriber, Baltimore. If one who desires to be a Christian laying aside every weight and every sin, should own the building in which is conducted a large dry goods store, which, while containing a great variety of useful articles, also usually contains numerous articles that belong only to "the pride and vanity of the world," would a Christian commit sin in God's holy sight by having such worldly merchandise sold in a building of his or her possession?

This is a matter that must be decided by the individual conscience. If you believe the occupant is selling goods that tend to degrade the buyer in a moral sense, or to minister to any wicked or perverted taste, then you do well to change. It is possible, however, to be self-critical to an extreme degree in such matters, and to imagine evil where none exists.

As an illustration of the stimulating influence of one good work in inducing similar efforts elsewhere, we publish this letter from Philadelphia:

In your issue of March 17, 1896, you noticed our Home of Industry for Discharged Prisoners and it pieces of verse by the same Christian hand. The author was an invalid for many years before her death.

A reader in Alliance, Va., sends us this appeal:

There are many ministers in the South, and, perhaps, elsewhere in the United States, who do not get support in the ministry and have to supplement their pittance of salary by some kind of manual labor. Some of these have not the money to purchase books nor to take religious periodicals. To my knowledge there is no religious paper which many of these appreciate more highly than THE CHRISTIAN HERALD; but they have not the means to take it. Will not some of the kind-hearted Christian readers of your paper who have the means, send to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offering to help them get this grand paper which will help them so much in their work? ONE OF THEM.

G. A. M., Bedminster, N. J. In your sermon of January 27, 1897, I noticed the statement, "The Bible says we will be higher than the angels. Will you please inform me where it is found? We had the same subject brought up in our Sunday school class only a few weeks before. One young man said the Bible said so, but could not tell where it is found; and that is the reason I ask for the above information."

You will find the passage in 1. Cor. 6:3, which justifies the statement.

A CONGRESS OF AMERICAN MOTHERS.

A Great National Gathering of Matrons at the Nation's Capital—The First Assemblage of its Kind—Important Topics Discussed.

OUR Nation's Capital was last week the scene of an event of the highest interest to all who hold home to be "the dearest spot on earth." The National Congress of Mothers assembled here in high convocation. It was not a congress to make laws, to regulate duties, to negotiate treaties, or to decide political questions; the remarkable body of American women who met there were drawn thither for an object whose importance reaches beyond the scope of ordinary legislation, and which has closer relation to the pure happiness and prosperity of our nation in any measure Congress has now before it. The welfare of the children and the manifold interests of the home. As stated in the call issued for the Congress, it was proposed to consider many subjects bearing upon the betterment of the spiritual and physical as well as mental training of the young, such as the value of kindergarten work and the extension of its principles to more advanced studies; the love of humanity and country; the physical and mental evils resulting from some of the present methods of our schools, and the advantages to follow from a closer relation between the influence of the home and that of institutions of learning; also the means of developing in children characteristics which elevate and ennoble them, and thus assist in overcoming the conditions which prompt crime, and make necessary the maintaining of jails, work-houses, and reformatories.

Origin of the Movement.

The idea of such a movement originated with Mrs. Theodore W. Birney, a wealthy philanthropic lady, who believed that a time had arrived for organized and earnest effort on the part of American mothers concerning questions vital to the welfare of their children. She presented the subject at the Mothers' Meetings at Nauvauqua in 1895 and it was so well received that the first steps were then taken which, followed by others, led finally to the great gathering of last week in Washington. Associated prominently and actively with Mrs. Birney in the preliminary work were many noble women, and it is their splendid ability, tireless energy and zeal for the cause that the success of the Congress is very largely to be attributed. Among these ladies were Mrs. Rebecca Hearst and Miss Emma Morton of Washington. The former, who is the wife of a Western millionaire, has done more charitable work than most women of the present day, and she supports eighteen kindergartens while thirty young people abroad and fifteen in the United States are now being educated at her expense. Mrs. Hearst's liberal heart prompted her to stand as godmother for the plan to hold the Mothers' Congress and much of the preliminary work was outlined in her beautiful home in Washington.

An Army of Workers.

Other ladies, too, were interested and on a large band of workers were making propaganda for the proposed Congress. Mrs. Kincaid of San Francisco, another wealthy woman, threw open her beautiful home in the interest of the movement and likewise did many other ladies, South and West. Mrs. Adlai E. Stevenson, wife of the Vice-President of the United States, Mrs. John R. Lewis of New York, wife of a retired general of the U. S. Army and for a number of years interested in women's clubs and children's work),

Mrs. Daniel Lamont, Mrs. John G. Carlisle, Miss Herbert, Mrs. William L. Wilson, Mrs. Judson Harmon, Miss Janet Richards, Mrs. Ella H. Micou, Mrs. Ellen Henrotin, President of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, (representing 200,000 women), Mrs. Mary Low Dickinson, and many others were also in active sympathy with, and rendered valuable aid to, the movement. One of the most valued workers was Mrs. Henry J. Finley (formerly Dr. Clara Bliss Hinds) widely known as an author and lecturer on the philosophy of hygiene and woman's work generally. The following officers were appointed to take charge of all arrangements for the Congress:

Mrs. Theodore W. Birney, President; Mrs. Phebe A. Hearst, First Vice-President; Mrs. John R. Lewis, Vice-President; Mrs. Adlai Stevenson, Vice-President; Mrs. Mary E. Mumford, Vice-President; Miss Emma Morton, Treasurer; Miss Mary Louisa Butler, Corresponding Secretary.

Chairmen of Committees.

Executive, Mrs. Theodore W. Birney; Reception, Mrs. Wm. L. Wilson; Transportation, Mrs. H. W. Fuller; Arrangements, Mrs. A. A. Birney; Entertainment, Mrs. James H. McGill; Literature, Mrs. Harriet A. McLellan; Press, Mrs. Henry J. Finley.

With these capable and enthusiastic officers working together in the utmost harmony, the arrangements progressed smoothly and when the time of the assembling of the Congress approached, all had been done that was needed for the comfort of the delegates. It was decided to hold the Congress in the Arlington Hotel, and at the opening session on the forenoon of Feb. 17th, the banquet hall was packed with delegates and spectators—the whole presenting an attractive and notable scene.

The Congress Meets.

No Congress that ever assembled could have had a more interesting personnel. It was a distinctly representative gathering, and showed to the world the grace, the dignity and intellectuality of American womanhood. There were in the brilliant gathering ladies of great wealth and high social position, and there were others comparatively unknown in the circles of fashion, but all met upon the common plane of sisterhood in the same grand cause. It was the first National Congress of Mothers ever held in any land, so far as known. Rev. W. H. Milburn, the blind chaplain of the United States Senate, offered the opening prayer, after which President Birney made a brief address of welcome to the delegates who were in attendance from all parts of the Union. A responsive address in behalf of the delegates was made by Mrs. Mary Lowe Dickinson, of New York, and then the officers and delegates of the Congress attended a reception given at the White House in their honor by Mrs. Cleveland. On the afternoon of the 17th, the delegates listened, with interest, to addresses on "Mother and Child of the Primitive World," by Frank Hamilton Cushing, of Washington, D. C.; "Mothers of the Submerged World and Day Nurseries," by Mrs. Lucy S. Bainbridge, of New York City, a most interesting and instructive paper; "What the Kindergarten Means to Mothers," by Miss Amalie Hofer, of Chicago, Ill., and "Parental Reverence as taught in the Hebrew Homes," by Mrs. Rebekah Kohut, of New York City, an address that contained many valuable suggestions. On Wednesday evening addresses were delivered on "Mothers and Schools," by Mrs. W. F. Crofts, of Washington, D. C.; and "The Value of Music in the Development of Character," by Rev. W. A. Bartlett, of Lowell, Mass.

Addresses on Many Topics.

On Thursday the speakers and their subjects were as follows:

"Dietetics," by Mrs. Louise M. Hogan, of Germantown, Pa.

"Mother's Relation to the Sound Physical Development of her Child," by Mrs. Jenness Miller, of Washington, D. C.

"Reproduction and Natural Law," by Mrs. Alice Lee Moque, of Washington, D. C.

"The Moral Responsibility of Women in Heredity," by Mrs. Helen M. Gardner, of Boston, Mass.

"The Mother's Greatest Needs," by Miss Frances Newton, of Chicago, Ill.

"Play Grounds," by Miss Constance Mackenzie, of Philadelphia, Pa.

"Some Practical Results of Child Study," by Dr. G. Stanley Hall, of Worcester, Mass.

"Reading Courses for Mothers," by Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster, of New York City, an exceedingly entertaining address full of bright suggestions.

"How to Guard our Youth Against Bad Literature," by Anthony Comstock, of New York City.—A paper showing the secret foes who invade home purity.

"How Shall the Nation Secure Educated Mothers?" by Mrs. Stanton Blatch, of New York City—timely and suggestive.

MRS. J. H. MCGILL.
COMMITTEE OF ENTERTAINMENT.

"Club Organization," by Mrs. Ellen M. Henrotin, of Chicago, the newest development of woman's intelligent social life.

Among the rules adopted for the government of the Congress was one forbidding the admittance of any one to the hall during the reading of a paper, and in order that all the addresses might receive the undivided attention of the audience. Another rule—adopted in the form of a resolution—requested the ladies to remove their hats during the sessions of the Congress. All the ushers were young ladies, and the general arrangements for seating, etc., were as perfect and satisfactory as could be wished. No color line was drawn, as several colored delegates had been invited and were welcomed on equal terms. Many of the ladies spoke extemporaneously, and all the addresses were marked by a logical clearness, a grace and power in delivery, and an earnestness in the tone and manner of the speakers that frequently awoke the enthusiastic plaudits of the audience. The few addresses by gentlemen were also heard with deep interest. Full stenographic reports were made of all the proceedings and speeches of the Congress and these, when published, will be a volume full of interest and importance to all who have the cause of American motherhood at heart. At the conclusion of the work of the Congress, the delegates returned to their homes greatly benefited by their experience, and full of new zeal for a movement that had unexpectedly reached such grand proportions, and whose prospects are brighter than could have been anticipated.

On the first page of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and also on this page, are presented the portraits of some of those ladies who were foremost in all the arrangements for the Congress. An extraordinary amount of correspondence was entailed in the preliminary work, and the duties of the various committees were by no means light ones. Excellent rates were secured by the Transportation Committee, from the trunk lines, resulting in a large attendance from all parts of the country, North, West and South.

All inquiries relative to the work of the Mothers' Congress or concerning any subsequent action to follow, should be addressed to Mrs. Henry J. Finley, No. 1429 20th Street, Washington, D. C., at whose hands they will doubtless receive prompt attention.

THE "BLUE ROOM" IN THE WHITE HOUSE, WHERE RECEPTIONS ARE HELD.

On Friday morning the programme was as follows:

"Heredity," by Mrs. W. H. Felton, of Cartersville, N. C.

"Physical Culture," by Miss Julia King, of Boston, Mass.

"Character Building versus Education," by Mrs. Ellen Richardson, of Boston, Mass.

"National Training School for Women," by Mrs. Sallie A. Cotten, Falkland, N. C. a most comprehensive address on an all important topic.

"Nature Studies in the Home," by Miss Anna A. Schryver, of Ann Arbor, Mich.

"Youth and Literature," by Hamilton Mabie, of New York City.

"Stories," by Dr. Walter L. Hervey, N.Y.

A SHATTERED FAITH.

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: Acts 27: 44: "Some on broken pieces of the ship."

EVER off Goodwin Sands, or the Skerries, or Cape Hatteras, was a ship in worse predicament than, in the Mediterranean hurricane, was the grain-ship on which two hundred and seventy-six passengers were driven on the coast of Malta, five miles from the metropolis of that island, called Citta Vecchia. After a two-weeks' tempest, when the ship was entirely disabled, and captain and crew had become completely demoralized, an old missionary took command of the vessel. He was small, crooked-backed and sore-eyed, according to tradition. It was Paul, the only unscarred man aboard. He was no more afraid of a Euroclydon tossing the Mediterranean Sea, now up to the gates of heaven and now sinking it to the gates of hell, than he was afraid of a kitten playing with a string. He ordered them all down to take their rations, first asking for them a blessing. Then he insured all their lives, telling them they would be rescued, and, so far from losing their heads, they would not lose so much of their hair as you could cut off with one click of the scissors; nay, not a thread of it, whether it were gray with age or golden with youth. "There shall not a hair fall from the head of any of you."

Knowing that they can never get to the desired port, they make the sea on the fourteenth night black with overthrown cargo, so that when the ship strikes it will not strike so heavily. At daybreak they saw a creek, and in their exigency resolved to make for it. And so they cut the cables, took in the two paddles they had on those old boats, and hoisted the mainsail so that they might come with such force as to be driven high up on the beach by some fortunate billow. There she goes—tumbling toward the rocks, now prow foremost, now stern foremost, now rolling over to the starboard, now over to the larboard, now a wave dashes clear over the deck, and it seems as if the old craft has gone for ever. But up she comes again. Paul's arms around a mast, he cries: "All is well. God has given me all those that sail with me." Crash! went the prow, with such force that it broke off the mast. Crash! went the timbers, till the seas rushed through from side to side of the vessel. She parts amidships, and into a thousand fragments the vessel goes, and into the waves two hundred and seventy-six immortals are precipitated. Some of them had been brought up on the seashore, and had learned to swim and with their chins just above the waves and by the strokes of both arms and propulsion of both feet, they put out for the beach, and reach it. But alas for those others! They have never learned to swim, or they were wounded by the falling of the mast, or the nervous shock was too great for them.

Oh, what will become of them? "Take that piece of a radder," says Paul to one. "Take that fragment of a spar," says Paul to another. "Take that image of Castor and Pollux." "Take that plank from the lifeboat." "Take anything, and head for the beach." What a struggle for life in the breakers! Oh, the merciless waters, how they sweep over the heads of men, women and children! Hold on there! Almost ashore, keep up your courage

Remember what Paul told you. There, the receding wave on the beach leaves in the sand a whole family. There crawls up out of the surf the centurion. There, another plank comes in, with a life clinging fast to it. There, another piece of the shattered vessel, with its freightage of an immortal soul. They must by this time all be saved. Yes: there comes in last of all, for he had been overseeing the rest, the old missionary, who wrings the water from his gray beard and cries out: "Thank God, all are here!"

Gather around a fire and call the roll. Paul builds a fire, and when the bundle of sticks begin to crackle, and, standing and sitting around the blaze, the passengers begin to recover from their chill, and the wet clothes begin to dry, and warmth begins to come into all the shivering passengers, let the purser of the vessel go round and see if any of the poor creatures are missing. Not one of the crowd that were plunged into the sea. How it relieves our anxiety as we read: "Some on broken pieces of the ship. And so it came to pass that they escaped all safe to land."

Having on previous occasions looked at the other passengers, I confine myself to-day to an examination of those who came in on broken pieces of the ship. There is something about them that excites in me an intense interest. I am not so much interested in those that could swim. They got ashore as I expected. A mile of water is not a very great undertaking for a strong swimmer, or even two miles are not. But I cannot stop thinking about those on broken pieces of the ship. The great Gospel ship is the finest of the universe, and can carry more passengers than any craft ever constructed, and you could no more wreck it than you could wreck the throne of God Almighty. I wish all the people would come aboard of her. I could not promise a smooth voyage, for oftentimes it will be tempestuous or a chopped sea, but I could promise safe arrival for all who took passage on that Great Eastern, so called by me because its Commander came out of the East, the star of the East a badge of His authority.

But a vast multitude do not take regular passage. Their theology is broken in pieces, and their life is broken in pieces, and their habits are broken in pieces, and their worldly and spiritual prospects are broken in pieces, and yet I believe they are going to reach the shining shore, and I am encouraged by the experience of those people who are spoken of in the text: "Some on broken pieces of the ship."

One object in this sermon is to encourage all those who cannot take the whole system of religion as we believe it, but who really believe something, to come ashore on that one plank.

I do not underrate the value of a great theological system, but where in all the Bible is there anything that says: Believe in John Calvin and thou shalt be saved? or, believe in Arminius and thou shalt be saved? or, believe in Synod of Dort and thou shalt be saved? or, believe in the Thirty-nine Articles and thou shalt be saved? A man may be orthodox and go hell, or heterodox and go to heaven. The man who in the deep affection of his heart accepts Christ is saved, and the man who does not accept him is lost.

I believe in both the Heidelberg and Westminster Catechisms, and I wish you all did; but you may believe in nothing they contain except the one idea, that Christ came to save sinners, and that you are one of them, and you are instantly rescued. If you can come in on the grand old ship, I would rather have you get aboard, but if you can only find a piece of wood as long as the human body, or a piece as wide as the outspread human arms, and either of them is a piece of the cross, come in on that piece. Tens of thousands of people are to-day kept out of the Kingdom of God because they cannot believe everything.

I am talking with a man thoughtful about his soul who has lately traveled through New England and passed the night at Andover. He says to me: "I cannot believe that in this life the destiny is irrevocably fixed; I think there will be another opportunity of repentance after death." I say to him: "My brother, what has that to do with you? Don't you realize that the man who waits for another chance after death when he has a good chance before death, is a stark fool? Had not you better take the plank that is thrown to you now and head for shore, rather than wait for a plank that may by invisible hands be thrown to you after you are dead? Do as you please, but as for myself, with pardon for all my sins offered me now, and all the joys of time and eternity offered me now, I instantly take them, rather than run the risk of such other chance as wise men think they can peel off or twist out of a Scripture passage that has for all the Christian centuries been interpreted another way." You say: "I do not like Princeton theology, or New Haven theology, or Andover theology." I do not ask you on board either of these great men-of-war, their portholes filled with the great siege-guns of ecclesiastical battle. But I do ask you to take the one plank of the Gospel that you do believe in and strike out for the pearl-strung beach of heaven.

Says some other man: "I would attend to religion if I was quite sure about the doctrine of election and free agency, but that mixes me all up." Those things used to bother me, but I have no more perplexity about them; for I say to myself: "If I love Christ and live a good, honest, useful life, I am elected to be saved; and if I do not love Christ, and live a bad life, I will be damned, and all the theological seminaries of the universe cannot make it any different." I floundered along while in the sea of sin and doubt, and it was as rough as the Mediterranean on the fourteenth night, when they threw the grain overboard, but I saw there was mercy for a sinner, and that plank I took, and I have been warming myself by the bright fire on the shore ever since.

While I am talking to another man about his soul he tells me: "I do not become a Christian because I do not believe there is any hell at all." Ah! don't you? Do all the people of all beliefs and no belief at all, of good morals and bad morals, go straight to a happy heaven? Do the holy and the debauched have the same destination? At midnight, in a hallway, the owner of a house and a burglar meet; they both tire, and both are wounded, but the burglar dies in five minutes and the owner of the house lives a week after; will the burglar be at the gate of heaven, waiting, when the house-owner comes in? Will the debauchee and the libertine go right in among the families of heaven? I wonder if Herod is playing on the banks of the river of life with the children he massacred. I wonder if Charles Guiteau and John Wilkes Booth are up there shooting at a mark. I do not now controvert it, although I must say that for such a miserable heaven I have no admiration. But the Bible does not say: "Believe in perdition and be saved." Because all are saved, according to your theory, that ought not to keep you from loving and serving Christ. Do not refuse to come ashore because all the others, according to your theory, are going to get ashore. You may have a different theory about chemistry, about astronomy about the atmosphere, from that of others adopt, but you are not, therefore, hindered from action. Because your theory of light is different from other theories, do not refuse to open your eyes. Because your theory of air is different from other theories, do not refuse to breathe. Because your theory about the stellar system is different from other theories, do not refuse to acknowledge the stars. Why should the fact that your theological theories are different hinder you from acting upon what you know? I have not a whole ship fastened in the theological drydocks to bring you to a safe age, you have at least a plank. "Some on broken pieces of the ship."

"But I don't believe in revivals!" I go to your room, and all alone, with door locked, give your heart to God. Join some church where the thermometer never gets higher than fifty in the shade.

"But I do not believe in baptism." Come in without it and settle that afterward. "But there are so many inconsistent Christians!" Then come in and show them by a good example how professors should act. "But I don't like the Old Testament!" Then come in on the New. "But I don't like the Epistles of Romans." Then come in on Matthew or Luke. Refusing to come to the shore, whom you admit to be the Saviour, you are lost, because you cannot admit that things, you are like a man out of the Mediterranean tempest, and so in the Melita breakers, refusing to come ashore until he can mend the pieces of a broken ship. I hear him say: "I will go in on any of these planks until I find in what part of the ship they belong. When I can get the windlass in the place, and the sails set, and that keel where it belongs, and that floor right, and these ropes untangled, I will come ashore. I am an old sailor, and know about ships for forty years, and as long as I can get the vessel afloat in good stead, I will come in." A man drifting on a piece of wood overhears him and says: "You will drown before you get the ship reconstructed. Better do as I am doing. I know nothing about ships, and I saw one before I came on board this ship. I cannot swim a stroke, but I am on the shore on this shivered timber." Then the ship goes down. The man who used to the plank is saved. O my brother, your smashed-up system of theology is the bottom, while you come in on a shivered spar! "Some on broken pieces of the ship."

You may get all your difficulties solved as Garibaldi, the magnetic Italian of the gardens made. When the war between Austria and Sardinia broke out, he was living at Caprera, a very rough and uncultured island home. But he went with his sword to achieve the liberation of Naples and Sicily, and gave the people free government, under the name of Emmanuel. Garibaldi, after being two years from Caprera, returned when he approached it, he found at home had, by Victor Emmanuel, as surprise, been Edenized. Trimmings had taken the place of thorns, the old rookery in which he once had given way to a pictured island. And I tell you if you will come in on the banner of our Victor Emmanuel, and follow him through thick and thin, and fight his battles, and endure his sacrifices, you will find after awhile he has changed your heart from a thicket of thorny scepticism into a garden that blooms with luxuriant joy that you never dreamt of. From a tangled thicket of sadness into a paradise of God.

I do not know how your theological system went to pieces. It may be that your parents started you with only a plank you believe little or nothing. Or they have been too rigid and severe in religious discipline, and cracked you over the head with a psalm-book. It may be that some partner in business who was a member of an evangelical church played on you a trick that disgusted you with religion. It may be that you have associated with people who have talked against Christianity in our presence until you are "all at sea." Or you dwell more on things that you do not believe than on things you do believe. You are in one respect like Lord Nelson, when a signal was lifted that he wished to regard, and he put his sea-glass to his eye and said: "I really do not see the signal." Oh, my hearer, put this field-glass of the Gospel no longer to your eye, and say, I cannot see, but put it to your other eye, the eye of faith, and you will see Christ, and he is all you need see.

You can believe nothing else, you certainly believe in vicarious suffering, for you see it almost every day in some shape. The steamship Knickerbocker, of the New York and New England line, running between New Orleans and New York, was in great distress, and the captain and crew saw the schooner Mary D. Cranmer, of Philadelphia, in distress. The weather cold, the waves mountain high, the first officer of the steamship and four men put out in a life-boat to save the crew of the schooner, and reached the vessel and towed it out of danger, the wind shifting so that the schooner was saved. But the five men of the steamship coming back, their boat capsized, yet righted again and came on. The sailors coated with ice. The boat capsized again, and three times upset and righted, and a line was thrown the other fellows, but their hands were frozen so they could not grasp it, and a great wave rolled over them, and they went down, never to rise again till the sea gives up its dead. Appreciate that heroism and self-sacrifice of the brave fellows all who are here, and can we not appreciate the Christ who put out into a more biting cold and to a more overwhelming surge, to bring us out of infinite peril into everlasting safety? The wave of human hate rolled over him from one side and the wave of Jewish fury rolled over him on the other side. Oh, the thickness of the night and the thunder of the tempest into which Christ plunged for our rescue!

Would rather, in a mud-scow, try to weather the worst cyclone that ever swept from the Caribbean, than risk my immortal soul in useless and perilous discussions in which some of my brethren in the ministry are indulging. They remind me of a company of sailors standing on the life-gate pier-head, from which the lifeboats are usually launched, and coolly discussing the different style of oar-locks and how deep a boat ought to set in the water, while a hurricane is in full blast, and there are three steamers crowded with passengers going to pieces in the offing. And I hear the muscles of his face working with nervous excitement, cries out: "This is no time to discuss such things. Man overboard! Who will volunteer? Out with her into the surf! Pull, my lads! Pull for the wreck! Ha! ha! Now we have them. Lift them in and lay them down on the bottom of the boat. Jack, try to bring them to. Put these ropes around their hands and feet, and I'll pull for the shore. God help me! Here! Landed! Huzza!" When there are so many struggling in the waves of sorrow and wretchedness, let all of us go but salvation for time and salvation forever.

I bethink myself that there are some here whose opportunity or whose life is as small as a wreck, and they have only a small piece left. You started in youth with all set, and everything promised a grand voyage, but you have sailed in the wrong direction, or have foundered on a rock, and have only a fragment of time left, when come in on that one plank. "Some broken pieces of the ship."

From many a deathbed I have seen the hands thrown up in deprecation something like this: "My life has been wasted. I had good mental faculties and fine social position and great opportunity, but through worldliness and neglect all has gone to waste save these few remaining hours. I now accept of Christ and shall enter heaven through his mercy: but alas, alas! that when I might have entered the haven of eternal rest with a full cargo, and been greeted by the waving hands of a multitude in whose salvation I had borne a blessed part, I must confess I now enter the harbor of heaven on broken pieces of the ship."

Enemies of Our Children

How the Disseminators of Impure Literature Plan to Destroy Innocence—The Society for the Suppression of Vice and Its Noble Work.

How shall we deal with those subtle and insidious influences that are at work in every community, poisoning the minds of youth and leading our children astray from the paths of morality and virtue? This is a problem that appeals with singular force to the fathers and mothers of our Union. While we carefully guard the home and its immediate surroundings from the intrusion of vice, and by sweet and holy example, lead our sons and daughters in ways of purity and rectitude, we know that there are dangers over which we have apparently but little control, and that evil influences may quickly undo the character-building of years. There is no sharper pain than that which lacerates a parent's heart when it is suddenly discovered that a beloved son or daughter has been corrupted by evil companionships or contaminated by impure books. One of the most appallingly destructive agencies in the world to-day, for the breaking down of youthful character and the demolition of all the virtues that combine to make youth noble and beautiful, are those printed infamies which, disgracing the "art preservative," take unto themselves myriads of wings, every wing a page, and flying like the winged pests of Egypt, enter our homes, our schoolrooms, and even our colleges and universities, leaving a foul and too often an indelible stain upon those whom they touch. There are no greater enemies of society than the disseminators of impure literature. They are the sworn foes of personal purity; they would drag down the innocent and trample them in the dirt of shame and corruption; the sons and daughters of Christian families are their special prey. They have in recent years flooded schools, seminaries, academies, colleges, with their vile prints, full of suggestions that are calculated to arouse the worst passions in young minds. They have even sent thousands of their debasing books and pictures to the young under the parental roof, illegally using the United States mails for this purpose. Pure young girls and bright, clean-hearted boys have been ensnared by these foul schemers, and many a parent's heart has been sorely wrung in consequence.

It was for the purpose of fighting this far-reaching evil that the Society for the Suppression of Vice was organized in New York City twenty-five years ago. For nearly a month, Mr. Comstock acted alone, without a single supporter, but soon friends came to his side. Mr. Morris K. Jesup was the first to become interested in the work and furnished the first contribution of $500. With this money more than $50,000 worth of vile engravings, electro plates, bound books, pictures and playing cards were seized. Almost immediately after this contribution, a representative Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association of New York City was appointed to take charge of the movement. A very short experience convinced the Committee that the traffic in evil books and pictures had reached such proportions that it could not be dealt with successfully by a mere Committee. This resulted in a charter for the Society for the Suppression of Vice being presented to the Legislature early in 1873. Officers were elected and the first Board of Managers was composed as follows: Mr. Charles E. Whitehead, President; D. H. Cochrane, L.L.D., A. S. Hatch and Wm. H. S. Wood, Vice-Presidents; John Paton, Treasurer, and an Executive Committee including: Jacob F. Wyckoff, Chairman; Henry R. Jones, S. H. Strang, Walter Edwards, Jr., R. R. McBurney, Fessenden N. Ous, M.D., Rutherford Stuyvesant, and Anthony Comstock, Secretary and Chief Special Agent. Messrs. Samuel Colgate, A. S. Barnes, William E. Dodge, Jr., William F. Lee, and many other eminent Christian citizens have served the Society in various capacities.

On March 5th, 1873, before the Society was incorporated, Mr. Comstock received a commission as Special Agent of the Post-office Department. He has been re-appointed every year, having served faithfully without taking a single dollar of compensation from the United States Government. This office has enabled him to reach many sources of evil outside the State of New York: to check many vile swindling schemes, and to suppress, to a very large extent, the general distribution of obscene matter through the mails.

At a later date, Congress enacted laws originally drafted by Mr. Comstock, and which aided the Society greatly in its work of suppressing vice. By these laws the mails were closed to all obscene books, pictures, and articles, the importation into this country of such articles was forbidden, and their sale was prohibited in the District of Columbia, the Territories, and places over which Congress had exclusive jurisdiction. Many state legislatures patterned after these laws and enacted similar statutes. At the present time a law drawn by the Society is now pending in the New York legislature for the purpose of preventing the sale of improper books and pictures, and to stop improper exhibitions.

A glance at the work accomplished by the Society, through its energetic Secretary and Special Agent, Mr. Comstock, discloses the story of a campaign against vice of such magnitude and importance as few fathers and mothers have dreamed of. Briefly summarized, the Society's officers, in 25 years have arrested 2,251 persons for printing and disseminating impure and debauching books, pamphlets, and pictures, and have tried, convicted and sent to prison about 1,600 such offenders. Mr. Comstock has seized and destroyed over 64,000 pounds weight of impure books and sheets of vile reading matter intended to deprave American boys and girls, and nearly 900,000 pictures and photographs of a character that no Christian parent would permit to be in his home. He has also seized and destroyed nearly 6,000 negatives and a vast number of wood-cuts, lithographic stones, stereotype plates, wicked songs and leaflets, and other articles such as are used by these dealers in their nefarious business. It has been the object of the Society all these years to reach the actual perpetrators of the crimes against morality, and to effectually destroy their possibility of further wickedness. This has been done, whenever possible, but vice is hydra-headed and the battle against it needs to be waged incessantly, if our homes and our children are to be protected from its baneful influence.

In the prosecution of his work, Mr. Comstock has repeatedly been in position of great peril. He has been stabbed by one man whose crimes he had detected, and on another occasion a noted offender lay in wait to shoot him in his offices in New York City. He and his agents have visited nearly all the states in pursuit of offenders, and everywhere have been aided and sustained by judges, courts, police and other authorities in their war on vice. The general attitude of the bench in dealing with this class of offenders, was tersely expressed by Judge Grosscup, of Chicago, in passing sentence upon two prisoners who had sent vile books through the United States mails. He said: "You are vipers and your crime is second only to murder. I would rather have a rattlesnake come into my house and crawl into my child's couch than to have your vile literature carried to him."

In the course of his investigations, some very remarkable evidence has come into Mr. Comstock's possession at times, showing that vile books and pictures are successfully scattered in places where none would ever suspect such being the case. The publishers of this debauching literature and the propagators of revolting practices, have even had agents among the servants of our colleges, and the sons of some of our most eminent citizens have been among their victims. In one instance at least, they have not hesitated to place their vile prints and still viler wares in the classes of one of the most famous young women's colleges in America. But the simple farmer boys and the little girls hardly escaped from mother's knee—they, too, are reached by the touch of this octopus-like evil, which—like the Minotaur of old, that yearly devoured a number of youths and maidens—feeds only on innocence. In one rural school in the northern part of New York state, it was shown that only three pupils had escaped the influence; every one of the others had received some publication expressly calculated to poison the mind of childhood!

The Society for the Suppression of Vice is maintained by voluntary contribution, and is deserving of the moral and financial support of all parents especially, and of every man and woman who believes in public morality. Its excellent work in the past with limited means at its disposal, gives hint of what might be accomplished were its resources larger. We commend it cordially to the support of our readers generally. Any readers of this journal knowing of the circulation of impure literature in their neighborhood or any improper use of the mails, would do well to communicate the facts to Mr. Comstock at 198 Times Building, New York, who will answer all inquiries regarding the Society and its work.

HELPING THE PASTOR.

Suggestions on the B. V. D. U. Topic for March 7. II. Cor. 7: 1-17.

PASTORS need help. They need it for the efficacy of their own work, and they need it to widen their sphere of usefulness. They may be helped by prayer. God will certainly bless the pastor for whom his people pray. They may be helped by regular and punctual attendance. The storm that will keep members away from church would not keep them away from business or from a place of amusement. The presence of his people in their places is an inspiration to a preacher which always cheers and helps him. An attentive demeanor is a help. It is hard work preaching to an audience whose faces show absent-mindedness or frivolity. It is a help to a pastor to have his people minister to each other. It shows that they have the spirit of Christ and are profiting by his teaching. It is a help, though of a negative kind, when his people refrain from gossip, from quarrels, from censorious criticism of him and of each other. Many a pastor's mind is harassed and his burdens increased by having to adjust differences and to reconcile quarreling members. It is a help to the pastor when his people are ready to work either in Sunday School, in visiting the sick, or in bringing others to the church. It commands the church to the world, makes his own duty lighter, and preaches an eloquent sermon to outsiders on the power and influence of Christianity. In all these ways and in others of like character the pastor may be helped. Cordial co-operation with him in his efforts makes him feel that his services are appreciated, and that there is hope for their success. Depression takes away the life and vigor of his sermons, and it is produced very readily by the coldness and indifference of the people to whom he ministers.

CALL TO WORK.

Suggestions on the Epworth League Topic for March 7, Isa. 6: 1-10.

VERY vivid is the imagery under which the prophet describes the origin of his mission. He is in the presence of God himself. He sees the adoration of angelic beings. He realizes how gross and sinful he is and that the people among whom he lives are like himself. He cries out in his humiliation and his lips are touched with celestial fire. There are two cures for corruption known to man—water and fire, the latter more searching than the former. This is applied and he is assured that his sin is purged. He becomes eager for service and when there is a call for a messenger he offers himself. But he is warned that his mission will fail. The people will not listen to him. Yet he is still desirous of going. God foresees that the result will be only a hardening of the people's hearts and that they will add to their sins by a rejection of the messenger and his message. Still, the opportunity is to be afforded them, even if they do shut their eyes and refuse to be converted. God will not compel men to behave. They must choose the good by their own volition and if they choose the evil they must take the consequences. So the call to the work came to the prophet and it comes in the same way to every heaven-sent messenger. His own heart must be purged that he may speak the word with power. He must not be deterred by the attitude of those to whom he goes. If the congregation is dull and apathetic; if the children in the Sunday School class are frivolous and careless, the message must still be spoken. Every Christian is responsible for doing that. He is bound to warn them of their danger, he will not be held accountable for the attitude of his hearers. His responsibility is to Him by whom he is sent. The faithful delivery of his message with all earnestness, with love and tenderness is his duty. Whether they hear or whether they forbear, is their own question, not his. God needs such messengers who will carry his message to the people and every converted soul may thus serve him. There are within the reach of every believer, some souls to whom he can bear the message of life. He is responsible for their hearing it.

GEORGE RECTOR.
A Very Youthful Contender.

enter, since there is probably no school without at least one pupil, boy or girl, who has a distinguished record. In the present friendly rivalry it is hoped that every Sunday School in the United States and the Dominion of Canada will participate, and that every pastor, superintendent or teacher will co-operate by sending in the name and attendance record of their best pupil, so that it may be entered on the Roll of Honor. These records must be vouched for by the superintendent or teacher, and the attendances must be consecutive and not disconnected, and must in all cases be certified up to Feb. 1, 1897. It is the purpose of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at the close of the competition, to award valuable prizes to the successful contestants. There will be a first and a second prize for male scholars, and a first and a second for female scholars as follows:

FIRST PRIZE—ELEGANT LARGE ART BIBLE (London Edition)—with nearly one thousand superb illustrations, bound in genuine seal—Divinity Circuit—kid lining, red under solid gold edges, with thumb index and appropriately inscribed: WORTH $25.00.

SECOND PRIZE—THE SAME BIBLE, bound in Divinity Circuit, Palestine levant, grained leather lining, red under gold edges, not indexed, and appropriately inscribed: WORTH $18.50.

ROLL OF HONOR PRIZES. For this competition all pupils who have made a record of 260 consecutive attendances and upward are eligible. Send name, with name of Sunday School and of superintendent or teacher, and the record of continuous attendance. Every successful competitor so vouched for will be presented with a Superb, Illustrated New Testament, beautifully bound in Divinity Circuit, with red under gold edges.

Among the letters received are some that omit to give the name and location of the Sunday School, and the name of the superintendent or teacher. These omissions must be rectified in order that the competing pupils may have an equal chance with all the others. Teachers and superintendents will kindly remedy these omissions as early as possible. The lists of competitors up to the present time are given above.

The lists will appear from week to week during the competition, thus enabling all who are interested to watch the progress of the contest. Among the letters received last week were the following:

KINGSTON, Pa. James Boyd, a member of the Presbyterian Sunday School of this place, has attended Sabbath School every Sunday for the last eleven years without missing a single session. His brother, Samuel, has a record of nine years, having never missed in that time. W. A. Moyer is the Superintendent of the school. W. F. CUTTEN.

BLUFFTON, O., Feb. 8th. Since January, 1881, Miss Gertrude Emison has not missed a single Sunday in attending Sunday School. All but two of these were attended in the Bluffton, Presbyterian Sunday School. She is an active member of the Presbyterian Church, and belongs to the young people's Bible Class. Until better informed we claim the championship. L. B. BIERY, Presby. S. S. Supt.

A friend in Perth Amboy, N. J., writes: George T. Woglom, aged seventeen, has a record of nine years' steady attendance at his Sunday School, Simpson M. E. Church, here.

HARLAN P. BRADSTREET.
At Present Leading the Boys' List.

Mr. George Fiske, Superintendent of the Maple Street Congregational Sunday School, of Danvers, Mass., writes:

Harlan P. Bradstreet is a member of our Sunday School, and is twenty-seven years old. He commenced attending Sunday School when seven years old, and has not been absent a single session for seventeen years, and only twice in twenty years. His absence for those two Sundays was due to an accident. He is a member of the Christian Endeavor Society and a regular attendant at all the prayer meetings, and always ready to witness for the Master. He is interested in all branches of Christian work. He united with the church when quite young.

Still another claimant from Pennsylvania comes to the front in this letter from a teacher:

In your last issue, you called for Sunday School teachers to send name of Champion Sunday School Scholar. I think we can claim that honor. Charles Sloop, now aged nineteen, has attended the Sunday School of the First Presbyterian Church of Kittanning, Pa., for twelve years regularly without missing a single day; and what is more, is always in his place in time when school opens, helps distribute papers, or whatever he may be called on to do.

Mrs. R. S. SLAYMAKER, Teacher.
Kittanning, Pa.

Mrs. J. E. Ardmore, Pa., writes concerning the three Fetter boys, whose wonderful Sunday School record has already been noticed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Lexington, Ky., was five miles from my Kentucky home, and John C. Eastland, George Currin have my sincerest congratulations for their honorable records. I read article on the subject with great interest strengthened by the devotion of our Fettes brothers to their Sunday School of Third Christian Church, Lancaster Ave. and Aspen Street, West Philadelphia. Their spirit take root and continue to grow in all the Sunday Schools throughout our Philip, Harry and Bruce Fettes, with close of 1896 completed the eleventh consecutive year in which they have attended school every session for a year. The Superintendent is Mr. Geo. H. Grove.

We would urge all in the United States and Canada who have an interest in this unique contest to forward their names without delay. Be careful to comply with the conditions of the competition, which are as follows:

1. Send full name and address of petitioner.
2. Name of Sunday School.
3. Name of superintendent or teacher who must vouch for accuracy of report.
4. Period of attendance, in years and weeks, up to Feb. 1, 1897.
5. Number of consecutive attendances.
6. All letters should be addressed to Sunday School Editor, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City.

After the prizes have been awarded to scholars, we shall commence the competition among Sunday School officers and teachers, and the rewards selected for this purpose will be fully described hereafter.

Do Mastodons Exist?

In many of our public museums are gigantic skeletons of the "mammoth" or "mastodon," two species of elephants posed to have disappeared from the long ago. Some scientists (writes Woodward in an exchange) think the disappearance was many thousand years ago, and till lately this has generally been accepted as fact. Again, the fact that these huge animals have sometimes found in Arctic regions, and in the ice, has been supposed to prove that at one time the earth enjoyed a polar spring, and that a sudden climate change which left these semi-tropical animals in a frozen condition where their bodies were preserved. It has been conjectured that this occurred at the time of the Flood. The finding of some mammoth tusks bearing marks of human use has caused some to consider this evidence of the antiquity of man preceding that assigned the race in the Bible.

But among the many things which come up to prove the truth of history, and to set aside theories, seems to be good evidence that at one species of these "extinct" animals still survives. The Portland (Me.) of Nov. 28th published a long communication with Col. C. F. Fowler, late of Alaskan Fur and Commercial Company, in which he gives very clear evidence in the interior of Alaska many mastodons still survive. He first discovered some "fossil" ivory collected by natives two tusks which showed evidence being recently taken from the natives, which carried them. On questioning a native who sold it to him, he was surprised to receive a full description of an immense beast, which had been killed by the natives, a description fully identical with the animal with the mastodon.

Colonel Fowler quotes Governor Ford, of Alaska, as having also investigated this matter, and as being satisfied that on the high plateaus of that country large herds of mastodons still roam unmolested by the natives, who fear greatly. The Alaska News also states that the evidence of their existence is strong to be denied.

The mastodon and mammoth were, as is commonly supposed, semi-aquatic animals, but were furnished—as the elephant is not—with a warm coat of hair, and were evidently designed for the climate which now exists where their remains are often found. Therefore, only are we relieved from the necessity of believing that the human race and the Bible history of the creation, are not obliged to assume a great sudden change in the earth's temperature at the time of the Flood, or at any time.

FIGHTING THE FAMINE.

India's Starving Millions See Relief Four Months Hence—Can they Live to Enjoy It?—What One Dollar Sent to Help them Now will Do.

RECENT reports from India encourage the hope that if the people can be carried over the next four months, the most terrible of the suffering will be alleviated. Rain has fallen over the greater part of the Punjab, and the prospect of crops in the Central Provinces, Bihar and the North-west Provinces, is "to good." How many of the poor will be alive to reap the crops in latter part of June depends on the state of Christendom. They can be kept only by liberal contributions reaching them through the missionaries who their extremity and whose hearts are aching to give them food. How bitter the need is may be inferred from a letter from a correspondent of a daily journal who has just returned from a journey to Bijapur, in the Bombay Presidency. He says: "I saw thousands working in the fields, but skeletons of cattle which had perished from lack of fodder, whose bones were had pecked clean. Great distress prevails, and the people are at their death. By June the amount of grain will be enormous." All opinions are that no famine within the past century has been half so terrible. The people are hopelessly and are awaiting death. Women and children are literally starving to death by hundreds. The people in the Central Provinces are emaciated to a degree quite awful. Men and women are so weak that they cannot weigh less than a hundred pounds and there are instances in plenty of adults weighing less than fifty pounds. The writer in another letter describes the state of the poor in Raipur, in the Central Provinces. He says: "I found it besieged by crowds of laborers in the most state of destitution. Many of the people were skeletons, their faces quite sunken and their skins hanging in large folds while others again had swollen stomachs—a sign of extreme privation. I questioned several, and they said cattle-drivers and usually a strong, robust class who work in the fields—quite unfit for work of any kind. The men were in the same state. It is the worst I have yet seen, in the Jabalpur district worse still. If no seed comes this year the people will be utterly incapable of procuring food or other, and their condition next year will be too awful to contemplate."

How more pitiful is the description of the missionaries whose hearts are aching by the appeals to which they are unable to respond. Their houses are besieged by Christian natives, to whom they have preached and who have turned to reverence them, now piteously pleading with the ministers of Christ for one meal to relieve their agony. It must be very gratifying to our readers if it is to us, to know that before this issue is published in this journal last week, we received the five thousand dollars forwarded by cable in anticipation of the relief fund. What gladness it will give to be able to feed the starving people whose tongue can tell. When it is remembered that with one dollar thus sent direct to the scene of destitution, ten persons can be fed for ten days, or one person for ten months, we can estimate what a little denial will do. It would be a happy day if before the five thousand dollars already sent are exhausted another remittance of like amount could be sent. This may be done if all our readers who can spare even a small contribution will send it promptly.

Many of the contributions received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during the past week have a touching interest which speaks volumes for the Christian spirit that prompted the gift. M. S., of Doylestown, Pa., writes: "Although I am a poor working girl, I would like to add my mite toward the relief fund for starving India. Enclosed find one dollar." Such a gift is not likely to escape the notice of Him who as he saw the rich casting their gifts into the Temple treasury, gave to the widow who cast in her two mites the commendation "she hath given more than they all." Another pathetic gift comes from a Home for Incurables in Brooklyn, N. Y. The poor sufferers and their helpers sent six dollars with the prayer (which must enter the heart of the compassionate Saviour), that God will stir up the hearts of people to give of their abundance to the distressed nation. Another letter enclosing a gift which is sent by Mrs. E. Elam, of Bakersville, Va., testifies to an experience which is invariably with those who, in the purity of their hearts, give to the needy for Christ's sake.

STARVING NATIVES BY THE ROADSIDE PLEADING FOR RELIEF.

She writes: "I try to help the needy as far as I am able, and I believe the good Lord blesses me in many ways." From a lady in Lynn, Mass., comes a gift of two dollars, which was plainly not easily spared, but was given as she says because she felt that in the presence of suffering so dire she would "be worse than a heathen" if she did not do all she could. Perhaps one of the most interesting of all the letters, however, comes from May Milburn, secretary of the Junior Epworth League, of Delphos, O. In a beautifully worded letter Miss Milburn says that the Juniors had saved $2.57 to pay for an Easter treat, but having read of the suffering of the starving people of India, they decided to give up their treat and send the money to keep some poor creatures alive. We should like to know the members of that Junior League. God has surely blessed them. They have received the spirit of Christ and learned the glorious lesson of self-denial in his cause.

The Art of Doing Good.

THERE is an art in everything. If, when the harvests are ripe, we should go into the fields, we would find that while one husbandman goes over the field, cutting down the grain with great exhaustion, halting at the end of the first swath before he has strength again to strike into the grain, another man goes for two or three hours without halting, save to sharpen his instrument—goes from one side of the field to the other without any special fatigue. What is the difference? In the one case the man knows how to swing the scythe, and in the other he does not. One man will go out with a fishing apparatus that has cost him fifty dollars, and catch absolutely nothing the livelong day; while another man, with an apparatus prepared with his own jack-knife, will catch so many of the spoils of the water that his basket will scarcely hold them. What is the difference? In the one case the man knows how to fish; in the other he does not.

We acknowledge that there is an art in everything. Is there any art in religion? Why is it that one man starts out in the Christian life and makes rapid advancement? He seems to walk across the field, going from one degree of grace to another, getting stronger and mightier in the Christian life, with no especial drawback, his misfortunes and his trials becoming his coadjutors, so that at the end of thirty years he can look back and see that he has one long, complete triumph; while another man will be thirty years in the church of God and achieve nothing. Why is it that the one man goes ahead and the other goes back? Is there any art in religion? There is. No man gets along in Christian life by accident. There is no such thing as slipshod. If a man advances in the Christian life rapidly and mightily, it is because he employs certain means and does certain things in order to gain those achievements.

Which Denomination?

WILL come to think less and less of the name of a church to which a man belongs, and more and more of the good he accomplishes. I no more hold the Roman Catholic Church responsible for the persecutions in the past than I hold the Puritan descendants of New England responsible for the fact that their ancestors burned witches. I put the piety of a Roman Catholic servant girl of my own household against the harshness and intolerance of some priding themselves on their orthodoxy. Protestants do not like the Pope at Rome; but we have in all our Protestant denominations little popes with thumbscrews in their vest-pockets, and they would burn at the stake tomorrow, all those who differ from them, if they dared. I like a Roman Catholic pope five hundred times better than a Methodist pope, or a Baptist pope, or a Congregational pope, or a Presbyterian pope. If you are going to lord it over God's heritage, put on your canonicals and let us see who you are. All our denominations today are laboring under the fact that some ecclesiastic has set down on them, and they are impatiently waiting for his funeral. All along the line of our great denominations, the word will after awhile be given, and there will be a rising up that shall be the emancipation of Christendom. I have been told by men in all the great denominations of Christians in this country at different times, that there are men in their denominations standing in the way of all progress and all Christian enthusiasm. The difference between the Roman Catholic Church and the Protestant has been that the former has one Pope and the latter many. There is no country on earth where it requires so little timber to make a pope as in this country. Let us in all our denominations brave the equality that comes from standing on our platform and in the service of our Master; the preacher of a mission station side by side with an archbishop, and the minister that preaches in a linen coat, a brother to him that has a new color of gown for every change in the service.

Incompetent Wills.

MORE and more frequent are the efforts to prove men insane, so that they are incompetent to manage their property or make wills. It is more and more a habit in this country to brood over the eccentricities of wealthy men in attempts to hatch out mental incompetency. What vast sums expended in trying to prove that testators are non compos mentis. I do not know the merits of any of these cases, but the general rule is that if a man has wit enough to make money he ought to be considered wise enough to keep it. I have noticed that the sanity of testators is never questioned except by those who are cut off with an unsatisfactory portion, and that most aged people, if poor, are by their relatives thought to be able to take care of themselves; but when they hold large sums of money, immediately people become anxious about their incapacity. It ought to be a matter of consolation to persons of moderate possessions that they escape such assault, that they have so little money to fight about, and that they can have lawful eccentricities without being sent either to the insane asylum, or pronounced by the courts to be crazy. The fact is that the miserly spirit is always a species of insanity; but if all the men who hold with inordinate grip to their worldly possessions were pronounced imbecile, then you might take the whole earth for a Bedlam. The most difficult of all undertakings is to hold large property and preserve at the same time mental and moral equilibrium. In the majority of cases they topple either into parsimony or into dissipation. There are a million men to-day in this country insane on the dollar question. They have distorted and unhealthy ideas as to what money is worth, and spend their days in trying to drive a full-grown camel through the eye of a cambric needle. Whatever surrogates and judicial benches and jury boxes may think of their intellectual status, God decides their mental calibre when he says, "Thy fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee."

Mounted Police.

IT has become the habit of many people always to speak in derogation of our city constabulary, but what additional safety has been given many of our cities by the mounted squad of police? These men have wellnigh revolutionized things for good. Formerly, all a criminal wanted was swift feet to escape the police, where now the officer puts spurs to his horse and swoops upon the offender swift as a hawk. As long as we have so many intoxicated men riding through our parks and thoroughfares, reckless of human life, we want a mounted police to keep up with them. After men with fast horses have stopped at all the drinking saloons on the highway, there will be upturned vehicles and wild collision and loss of life, unless there be lightning hoofs ready to take after them. Well executed laws are mighty auxiliaries to religion. Honor the police. Passing them at night in the cold, give them salutation. It will cost you nothing to tip your hat and say: "Good night, officer." It will cheer them through the long hours. Under their official shield there beats a heart just like your own, with love of home and wife and child, and an appreciation of the amenities of society. They stand between you and incendiaryism and burglary and murderer's knife. Remember that these officers of the law are not only defenders of society, but messengers of God, and the policeman who, in the attempt to arrest a runaway horse with a family in the carriage, is killed, or who gets a child out of the third story window of a burning building, losing his own life in the attempt, is as much a martyr as anyone whom historian and poet and painter and orator have celebrated.

Almost always in the list of those who perish in great casualties are the names of some of the police. They slipped from the ladders, or helping others out, had not time to get out themselves, and their lacerated bodies were carried home and laid down amid wailing widowhood and orphanage. May God bless the captains and sergeants and detectives and patrolmen and doormen of our cities, arming them for the struggle against crime and for the defence of morals and religion!

Lanterns Wanted.

THIS is a dark world to many people. A world of chills, a world of fog, a world of wet blankets. Nine-tenths of the men we meet need encouragement. Your work is so urgent that you have no time to stop and speak to the people; but every day you meet scores, perhaps hundreds and thousands of persons upon whom you might have direct and immediate influence. "How? how?" you cry out. We answer: by the grace of physiognomy. There is nothing more catching than a face with a lantern behind it, shining clear through. We have no admiration for a face with a dry smile, meaning no more than the grin of a false face. But a smile written by the hand of God, as an index or table of contents to whole volumes of good feeling within, is a benediction. You say: "My face is hard and lacking in mobility, and my benignant feelings are not observable in the facial proportions." We do not believe you. Freshness and geniality of soul are so subtle and pervading that they will, at some eye or mouth corner, leak out. Set behind your face a feeling of gratitude to God and kindness toward man, and you will every day preach a sermon long as the streets you walk. The reason that there are so many sour faces among people we meet, so many frowning faces, so many dull faces, is because men consent to be acrid and petulant and stupid. The way to improve your face is to improve your disposition. Attractiveness of physiognomy does not depend on regularity of feature. We know persons whose brows are shaggy, and whose eyes are oblique, and noses are ominously longitudinal, and the mouth straggles along in unusual and unexpected directions; and yet they are men and women of so much soul that we love to look upon them, and their presence is an evangelism. They get married sooner than the painted doll-babies that call themselves young ladies, and make home happy long after the curls have turned gray.

BRIEF NOTES.

The new Speaker of the Japanese Parliament, Dr. Kazuo Hatoyama, is a graduate of Y. University. He is a recognized leader of West ideas.

From the recently published Year-Book Jews compiled by Mr. Joseph Jacobs, it appears that there are eleven million Jews in the world today, of whom nearly one-half are in Russia.

In 1886 Corea was a sealed nation. Christianity was absolutely prohibited. A brave missionary healed a nephew of the king, and to missionaries are welcomed with open arms by 15,000,000 inhabitants of the country.

The native church in connection with Church Missionary Society in the Fuh-kien Province, South China, increased in numbers twelve per cent. during 1897, and the native subscriptions were nearly double those of the previous year.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union Committee in New York have arranged for a special campaign for temperance in harmony with evangelistic campaign that is going on, and invited Mrs. Helen M. Bullock, of Elmira, to direct a series of meetings.

Mr. J. D. Rockefeller is offering a substantial inducement to the friends of Baptist mission relieve the Mission Boards of the burden of which is crippling their work. The total indebtedness is $486,000, and Mr. Rockefeller offers to $250,000 if other friends will contribute the remaining $236,000 before July 1st.

Rev. Jacob Freshman has accepted pastorate of the West Avenue Presbyterian Church, Buffalo, N. Y. A cordial reception tendered him and Mrs. Freshman in the park the church on their arrival, and the members of the church and the pastors joined in good wishes the success of the new pastorate.

Evangelist Henry Varley, of London, preaching in the Howard Street Methodist Episcopal Church, San Francisco. The Evening of that city says: "Those who heard Mr. Varley's former visit to the city can never forget his marvelous exposition of the Scriptures, and we found among his attentive listeners in the streets that are still to come."

Of the persons who made professional faith at Dr. L. W. Munhall's meetings at Otis, Can., 633 expressed a preference for the Methodist Church, 282 for the Presbyterian, 163 Protestant Episcopal, 81 Baptist, and 42 Congregational. Every case the pastor was notified so that he could follow the evangelist's work by special attention to the new convert.

The United Society of Christian Endeavor announces that arrangements have been definitely made for the next convention to meet at San Francisco, July 7th-12th. Arrangements are being selected for good terms for round-trip tickets, will permit delegates to go by one route and by another, and improve the opportunity for interesting places on the way.

The Committee of Clergymen of all Denominations in New York, appointed to consider condition of the daily press, has issued a urging the religious public to support only journals which manifestly aim to be clear, wholesome, and that if any journal should draw its Sunday edition it should have the date and generous support of religious citizens every denomination.

M. Escande, of the Paris Missionary Society, has been appointed one of the pastors of the Church in Madagascar. The queen remained in her Protestant faith, though persistent efforts have been made to induce her to enter the Catholic Church. M. Escande's appointment encourages and strengthens her in these troubles, and may perhaps do something to shield from these constant solicitations.

An English journal reports that Dr. Fleming, Vicar of St. Michael's Church, L. I., has arranged with the telephone company to place a large telephone transmitter in front of reading desk and pulpit of his church, with connection with one ward in each of the houses of the city, so that convalescents who are unable to leave the hospital may assemble in the ward and hear the service over the phone.

The Calvary Baptist Church, New York, Rev. Dr. R. S. MacArthur, pastor, will celebrate its fiftieth anniversary during the week beginning February 28. By a singular coincidence, it falls this year on the very day on which this church commenced its existence a half-century ago. The church hopes to commemorate this epoch in history by building a chapel as a thankoffering for mercies shown during a half-century.

Mr. Ira D. Sankey had an immense audience in St. Louis, Mo., on February 7. The friends of the Union Methodist Church hearing the famous singing evangelist was in the city, he way to the Pacific coast, pressed him to give a service of song. Half an hour before the service began, it was necessary to bolt the doors, as a great influx of space being occupied, while a crowd thronged the street outside. Mr. Sankey listened to with rapt attention both when he sang and spoke.

At the recent Annual Meeting of the Women's Christian Associations of Ontario at Quebec, it was stated that there are now in Canada the United States 1,500 associations, 275,000 members, 800 libraries, 1,000 reading rooms, 355 schools, 1,000 teachers, and 26,000 students. A great rally held in the Dominion Methodist Union, Alderman Stewart, who presided, read a greeting from the Governor-General, Lord Alden, who is Vice-President of the Y. M. C. A. Great Britain and Ireland.

The Young Women's Christian Association of New York, has issued its annual report showing material progress. For the first time in history, it is said, the Margaret Louise Hall all its current expenses. During the year women had board and rooms, and the total of meals served in the home restaurant was 1,000. During the year 4,374 applications for work were received, and 1,720 positions were filled. Receipts of the Association for the year were $100,000 and the total disbursements $47,979.

THE BIBLE

AND THE NEWSPAPER

CRISIS IN CRETE.

An acute crisis in the Eastern Question has developed from the action of Greece in reference to the island of Crete. Reports were current early this month that the Christian population of the island, being unable to bear the oppression of the Moslems, had taken up arms in resistance and that a state of anarchy prevailed. The Sultan of Turkey ordered an expedition to suppress the revolt of the Christians; and the next day expected was that of the massacre which usually follows in any part of the Sultan's dominions, when his savage, blood-thirsty troops are sent to quell an insurrection. But to the amazement of all Europe, the little kingdom of Greece suddenly announced that it would prevent the Turkish army from landing on the shores of Crete, and it promptly dispatched a fleet of torpedo boats to intercept the Turkish fleet. This meant war between Turkey and Greece, for no one could expect that the Sultan would tamely submit to being excluded from territory which undoubtedly belongs to him. The consequences of such a war might involve the Great Powers; and Turkey, knowing well the outbreak of such a crisis is dreaded by every government in Europe, appealed to the Powers to restrain Greece. They agreed to use their influence to that end and in order to avert the danger of a collision, persuaded the Sultan to postpone the sailing of the vessels which were ready to transport his army to Crete. The governments interested in the preservation of peace brought pressure to bear on Greece to induce the king to recall his fleet, but the king is himself in a difficulty, his subjects being strongly of the opinion that their government ought to help the Cretan Christians, with whom they are in close sympathy. The king of Greece has long found it difficult to restrain them from showing it actively and he is sure that if he yielded to the Powers, a revolution might break out which would menace his throne. In the meantime a new proposal has been made in the interests of peace, that Crete should be made independent, with Prince George, second son of the king of Greece, as governor, the island to continue to pay the tribute to Turkey, but it now pays, but be free from Turkish control. Whether the Sultan would entertain such a proposal is doubtful. One circumstance in its favor is that it may have the support of Russia, whose advice the Sultan is now taking. Prince George is a cousin of the Czar, whose life he saved about six years ago, when the two young men were in Japan together. An assassin attacked Nicholas, who was then Czar, and with his cousin Prince George was making the tour of the world. Prince George beat the assassin off with a stick, but not until Nicholas had received a stab that showed the assassin's murderous intent. If the Czar is grateful, he has now an opportunity of advancing his cousin's interests and, at the same time, of saving the people of Crete, who are being oppressed by the Sultan. With or without Russia's support, Greece seems determined to interfere. She attacked a Turkish transport which was carrying ammunition to a besieged Turkish garrison in Crete, fired three shots at the transport and compelled it to turn back. She is also believed to have landed troops in Crete to assist the insurgents. The Sultan is highly indignant and threatens to invade Greece if she persists in her hostilities. If he is wise, however, he will not risk a conflict in which the public opinion of all Europe would be against him. All Christendom is weary of his misgovernment and of the cruelties he practices on the peoples who are subject to his rule. It would gladden all hearts if we heard that at last the mandate proclaimed by the prophet of old, had been issued against the bloodthirsty tyrant.

Thou shalt devour men no more, neither bereave thy nations any more, saith the Lord. Ezek. 30, 14.

A Plank Valued above a Life.

A shocking act of inhumanity is reported from Williamsburgh, N. Y. At the foot of North Fourth Street there is an eddy in the river, where drift wood and light articles, dropped from any of the numerous craft in the river, are apt to be carried. The poor people along shore often go to the bank there with boat-hooks and ropes to secure these things. A few days ago, a man went to this place to get a load of sand from a boat that he kept moored there. He laid a plank from the pier to the boat and was just crossing it to the boat when the swell of a passing steamer struck the boat, and causing it to roll, the end of the plank slipped off and splashed into the water. The man fell in with it, but caught hold of the plank as he fell and supported himself with it. Two Poles who were on the pier gathering drift wood, saw the accident, and one of them stuck his boat-hook in the plank while the other flung a rope around it. The man who was clinging to the plank thought they were trying to save him, but when they had the plank near the pier they grabbed it and pulled it up, shaking him off as if he had been a rat. He scouted after them but they ran away carrying the plank, and left him struggling among the lumps of drift ice in the river. His shouts, however, attracted the attention of a man in a passing boat, who threw him a rope and hauled him off. After changing his clothes, he went in search of the two Poles and found them in a shed sawing up the plank. He made a complaint against them to the police, but they were unable to help him, as they knew of no law under which the Poles could be punished unless it was for stealing the plank. A more heartless thing than those Poles did has seldom been reported; but the principle on which they acted is only too common. Even among Christians there are some who are too busy trying to add to their property, to give any thought to the men who are perishing around them, and there are some people who, to make a little money by their lectures and books, would take away the Book by which the perishing might find salvation.

Through covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandise of you. (1st Peter 2, 3.)

Fire in a House of Refuge.

The House of Refuge on Randall's Island, N. Y., had a narrow escape from destruction by fire a few days ago. The seven hundred boys and one hundred girls confined in the institution, had retired to rest, as had the officers, and no one was stirring but the night-watchman who made his rounds at regular intervals. Shortly before two o'clock in the morning the watchman noticed that the dome over the north wing was illuminated. He knew that there ought to be no lights in it at that hour, and at once investigated. He found that a fire had broken out under the flooring and had sent a column of flame up into the dome. He gave the alarm to the officers and sent the Island tug over to New York for assistance. Happily the young delinquents in the house had been drilled for just such an emergency. Three sharp whistles, on every corridor of the north wing of the big four story building, brought every one of the

The wind was contrary and there was a very high sea, with heavy rain. While two of the crew were securing a grating, a heavy sea was shipped which washed them both overboard. A life-buoy was thrown to them and the vessel was stopped immediately and a life-boat manned by volunteers was lowered. One of the drowning men managed to secure hold of the life-buoy, but the other was sinking, when a man named Creelman jumped from the Maine's deck and swam to his assistance. He swam bravely, Captain Crowinshield says, but was unable to reach the drowning man, who sank and was not seen again. Creelman himself became exhausted, but succeeded in joining the other man on the life-buoy. Meantime, the crew of the life-boat was in danger. The high sea broke the swivel of the steering-oar and half filled the boat with water. Fearing that all would be drowned, Captain Crowinshield maneuvered his ship to shield them from the storm. It was a work of considerable danger and difficulty owing to the high wind and sea. In turning, the Maine rolled so heavily that one sea swept over her turrets and carried away two seamen who were drowned. The captain signalled to the men in the life-boat to return to the ship and they were eventually hauled on board, but the boat was abandoned. The ship was then maneuvered to rescue the two men who could still be seen clinging to the life-buoy. After a long time and many efforts, a rope reached them and they were drawn on board in a helpless condition. Captain Crowinshield asks that the Department give Creelman a life-saving medal of the first-class for his gallantry. It will be a graceful thing to do and it may be hoped, that the crew of the life-boat will not be forgotten. All deserve it for their noble efforts, although they failed to save the lives they endeavored to rescue. It was not with them as it was with our Saviour who, to rescue our race poured out his soul unto death, but he does not miss his reward.

He shall see of the travail of his soul and shall be satisfied; therefore will I divide him a portion with the great and he shall divide the spoil with the strong. (Isa. 53: 11.)

Moving a Village.

The novel spectacle of moving a village has been witnessed in New York state for several weeks. The Croton Watershed Commission recently took possession of the village of Katonah and notified the inhabitants that they must move away. The people were well acquainted with each other and had no wish to disperse. They, therefore, decided to found a new village of the old name about a mile away. The site was chosen, and since that time there has been a procession of houses from the old site to the new. The cottages are moved bodily, and in some instances without taking out the heaviest articles of furniture. One of the chief residents, a prominent politician, who is an ex-State Senator, preferred to build a new house rather than remove the old one. But he took a great pride in a grove of fine shade trees on his property, and these he decided to move. Trenches were dug around each tree about eight feet from the trunks, and the roots were undermined. Each tree was then raised on skids in an upright position, and was dragged by horses to the ex-Senator's property in the new village, where the grove is being carefully re-planted. Some of the trees are over forty feet high. About one-third of the residents of the village are already settled in their new location, and others are to follow speedily. There are many people who would be glad if some similar arrangement could be made for them when they leave the world altogether; but those who trust in Christ need have no such wish, having his own assurance of a better habitation.

In my Father's house are many mansions. . . I go to prepare a place for you. (John 14: 2.)

place to get a load of sand from a boat that he kept moored there. He laid a plank from the pier to the boat and was just crossing it to the boat when the swell of a passing steamer struck the boat, and causing it to roll, the end of the plank slipped off and splashed into the water. The man fell in with it, but caught hold of the plank as he fell and supported himself with it. Two Poles who were on the pier gathering drift wood, saw the accident, and one of them stuck his boat-hook in the plank while the other flung a rope around it. The man who was clinging to the plank thought they were trying to save him, but when they had the plank near the pier they grabbed it and pulled it up, shaking him off as if he had been a rat. He scouted after them but they ran away carrying the plank, and left him struggling among the lumps of drift ice in the river. His shouts, however, attracted the attention of a man in a passing boat, who threw him a rope and hauled him off. After changing his clothes, he went in search of the two Poles and found them in a shed sawing up the plank. He made a complaint against them to the police, but they were unable to help him, as they knew of no law under which the Poles could be punished unless three hundred boys confined in the wing out of bed. They, instructed by signals, dressed quickly, the cell-doors were opened simultaneously and all the boys marched to the play-ground, where they were drawn up in lines. Forty of the bigger boys were called out and sent to help the firemen with the little engine used on the Island. By this time the river fire-boat arrived and was throwing a steady stream of water on the burning wing. It was impossible to save it, but the firemen succeeded in saving other parts of the building. Damage was done to the amount of ten thousand dollars, but no life was lost. The name of the institution seems to make the fact of a fire there particularly pathetic. Happily the Christian knows that whatever may befall him, in his refuge he is safe.

Because thou hast made the Lord which is my refuge thy habitation, there shall no evil befall thee, neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling. (Ps. 91, 1.)

Heroism on a Battleship.

The Navy Department has received from Captain Crowinshield of the U. S. battleship Maine, a report of bravery rarely equaled. It states that on February 6, the Maine encountered a severe storm.

THE ETHIOPIAN CONVERT.

Sunday School Lesson for March 7.
Acts 8: 26-40. Golden Text, Acts 8:
35. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

AFTER the mission of Peter and John to the ready-made converts in Samaria they returned to Jerusalem, not, however, before they had testified and preached the Word of the Lord there, and also "in many villages of the Samaritans." Surely now the work, thus quickened by power from on high, would go forward, and Philip, with the help of so many Spirit-filled converts, would evangelize all the country round. This would, no doubt, have been the plan which would suggest itself to him; but God thought otherwise. "The angel of the Lord spake unto Philip, saying: Arise, and go toward the south, unto the way that goeth down from Jerusalem unto Gaza which is desert." This was Philip's Time of Testing.

He had been chosen as a man full of the Holy Ghost to the office of a deacon (Acts 6: 3-6); and yet the Holy Ghost had taken possession of none of his converts until Peter and John had come down from Jerusalem. Now it would be put to the proof whether Philip himself had received new grace in seeing the grace of God which accompanied this ministry; or whether feelings of jealousy would take possession of him that these apostles from Jerusalem were more used and favored than he. If Philip were filled with self-importance, he would have thought himself indispensable to the work at Samaria. Philip stood the test; he arose and went, and the work was left in the hands of him to whom it belonged. God had another mission for Philip.

An anxious soul, so anxious that he had taken the then difficult journey from Ethiopia to Jerusalem, was being prepared of God for the ministry of Philip. He was a man of no mean position, the treasurer of state in a country of some importance. He had thought it worth while to leave his country and his high office with all its great responsibilities, that he might know the truth about the God of Israel and might become acquainted with him. It was worth while for Philip to leave Samaria if God should use him in the conversion of such an one. The Ethiopian eunuch had performed his journey, but its object was not yet attained. One thing, however, and that no light thing, had been accomplished; he had got possession of a portion of the Word of God. How little he knew that the eye of his Creator was upon him as he unrolled it; and that just as he was reading the very Scripture which could meet his need he was to meet a prepared instrument, who should be used of God to open that Scripture to him! All God's ways are perfect. When we seek to bring things about and to arrange them ourselves, there is always a mistake somewhere, but God is perfect in knowledge and there is perfection in all his ways. Self-guidance entails often much loss of strength and time. As Philip reached the place which God had in counter to him without giving him any reason for taking such a journey, the chariot which the Ethiopian statesman drew near. "Go near and join thyself to this chariot," was spoken into his ear by the still voice of the Spirit which had directed his steps thither. With a woman's resolution the eunuch determined to go. readest?" "How can I except some man should guide me!" And the guide was there already, prepared of God; and the work was there for the ready worker. Who would have anticipated that the statesman would have invited an unknown stranger to take his seat beside him in his chariot of state, and listen with intense attention to a man whom he had never seen or heard of before? Who inspired him with such confidence? God the Holy Ghost. When God prepares interviews with conscious souls, there is no need for any human strain. God is the Doer of his own work; the instrument has only to fall in with him and the thing is done.

It was no accident that the very place of the Scripture where the distinguished

"They came to a certain water," and the new believer inquired: "What doth hinder me to be baptized?" "If thou believest with all thine heart thou mayest," was Philip's answer. "I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God." The chariot was drawn up to the side of the water, and there, in the lonely desert, but in full sight of all his heathen retainers, this man renounced his heathenism and idolatry; buried himself and his own past life by baptism into Christ took his part in his death as one with him in shame, and put on Christ as his life henceforth.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

LUKE probably heard this incident of early church life from Philip's own lips during the visit which he and Paul paid to the Evangelist at Caesarea, twenty years afterwards. As the two missionaries recounted the story of their labors among the Gentiles, Philip would naturally tell them of this conversion which carried the Gospel into the far-off African kingdom. It was the conversion of only one man, but at a time when Christianity seemed likely to become only a Jewish sect, it was important as an ininquirer read was that Gospel of the Old Testament the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah: "He was led as a sheep to the slaughter, and like a lamb dumb before his shearer, so he opened not his mouth: in his humiliation, his judgment was taken away; and who shall declare his greatness? for his life is taken from the earth." "I pray thee of whom speaketh the prophet thus, of himself, or of some other man?" inquired the eunuch. "O, how easy it is to preach the Gospel to a real inquirer, to one whose heart the Lord has opened! And how utterly nothing does his instrument feel when every answer comes from him who is with us and is not the product of our own resources!" Philip preached unto him Jesus, the Saviour who saves his people from their sins. Jesus, the despised and rejected of men, the patient Lamb dumb before her shearer, Jesus "wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities;" Jesus dividing "a portion with the great," and dividing "the spoil with the strong;" Jesus the Saviour, and the Saviour for him. The inquirer became the believer, and Philip's obedience to the Spirit had not been in vain, and God had gained ground in the life of Philip, while he gained also another heritage for his Son.

They went on then, the direction of the journey could not matter to a man whose steps were guided by the Lord.

dication of its destined universality. Whether the man was a Jew or a proselyte we are not told. The fact that he had been to Jerusalem to worship was an evidence that although he was high in office in a heathen kingdom he was a worshipper of Jehovah. He was returning, taking the direct southern route, which led through an unfrequented country that was then, as now, unsafe except for men who traveled, as the Eunuch probably did, with a retinue large enough to protect him from the brigands. His way would lie through Egypt and down the Nile valley to the Eastern Soudan. The name of Ethiopia was given to the belt of territory stretching across the continent south of Egypt, but in this instance was applied to the country of Meroe, which lay between the two branches of the Nile, having Abyssinia on the East and Khartoum on the West. From ancient historians we learn that it was ruled by a dynasty of women who took the name of Candace as a title, like the Pharaohs and the Caesars. The men of this country were tall and strong, black in color and notable warriors. This officer, whose name according to tradition was Indich, appears to have occupied a position corresponding to our office of Secretary of the Treasury. As he approached Gaza, the most southern of Palestine towns, Philip, divinely directed, approached his carriage. The eunuch was reading the book of Isaiah, and in Oriental fashion was reading aloud. Philip asked him if he understood what he was reading and was promptly invited to enter the carriage. The eunuch did not understand and was glad of the opportunity of getting help. The passage that puzzled him was that which in our version is fifty-third chapter. He wanted to know about whom the prophet had written. Philip could give him the answer and told him about Christ. The conversation was effective. The eunuch offered himself for baptism and Philip administered the rite. Tradition says that when he turned to Meroe he was the means of converting his queen and introducing Christianity to the country.

Arise and go . . . and he arose and went. Philip did not know why he was being sent to that desert road, but he obeyed his orders and he obeyed. "I wish I could feel like my dog does," said a boy waiting his shaggy friend as he ran after stick; "he always looks so pleased in mind, but I can't do it." It was a humiliating confession that a dog could set an example the boy could not follow. During the Peninsula War, an officer came to the Duke of Wellington with the statement that an order the Duke had given could not be executed. Such a move required more men than he had at his disposal. "I did not ask your opinion," said the Duke. "I gave you my orders and I expect to be obeyed." The officer returned gloomily and ordered out his men to undertake the impossible task. Lo! when he arrived at the scene of operations, the task was so easy, for the Duke was directing a powerful attack against another of the enemy's positions and had caused a diversion, which left the fort the officer was to take, comparatively unprotected.

What doth hinder me? In this case, baptism took place. But there are many hindrances which keep people from confessing Christ. In heathen lands is generally the dread of persecution. In many instances a young man who confesses Christ is turned out of his father's house and none of his friends will associate with him. In our own land, a young man is often hindered by the fear of ridicule. His companions may laugh at him, call him "Saint," and he naturally dislikes the jibes and taunts he may have to endure. Some of the figures uncovered at Pompeii show how the people lost their lives. There was a great fête going on when the earthquake was buried. The people who were in the amphitheatre, who ran for their lives, escaped; but those who stayed to save their homes to save valuables, perished. Several bodies have been found there, money and jewels in their hands. These were fatal hindrances.

Understandest thou? Philip seemed to have made no apology for thus unexpectedly addressing the illustrious treasurer. None was needed, as his coming was welcome. There is often more reverence for religion than is wise. The late Dr. Johnson used to tell the story of a vivid dream he had of the crowd waiting at the judgment. He fancied he saw one of his friends, a man who was a terrible time. But the other answered that he expected to be saved. "So," said his friend, "you knew the way of salvation?" "Yes," "Then why did you not tell me? You knew me well, you knew my danger, we often met, why did you never warn me?" "I thought you would resent my doing so." "Why, alive, if you saw me in a burning place, would you not have called to me? Would you have stood on ceremony? How much more when such an awful fate as this was before me!"

Preached unto him Jesus. Some people profess doubts whether Isaiah 53, the passage the Eunuch was reading, was to Christ, but Philip had no doubt, nor any doubt as to what to preach to the inquiring man. A minister traveling the South wanted to preach in a certain jail and obtained permission. As he did not know the way to the jail, a son of the host offered to be his guide. He came with him and heard the sermon. On his way back, the young man, who was a Christian, said to the minister: "I heard some of the convicts were imprisoned. Such a sermon as that ought to do good." "Did it do you good?" the minister asked. "Oh, you were preaching to the convicts!" The minister shook his head. "I preached Christ," he said, "you need him as much as they."

THE MODERN JEW IN HIS ANCESTRAL HOME

JERUSALEM AND THE EASTERN QUESTION
The Sacred City a Centre of Political Interest to the Whole World—The Disastrous Effect of Turkish Domination.

does not require study to see that Palestine is not its proper place locally. It is not an independent country and must be grouped somewhere. Its present assignment to Turkey is unfortunate in every way. It ought to belong to Egypt. It practically borders on the Suez Canal, the great thoroughfare between Europe and the far East. Its quickest connection with all the civilized world is through Port Said and Alexandria. Its climate, productions, market, commerce, business relations, and postal service compel the most intimate associations with Egypt, while Constantinople, at present its political head, is remote, and the interest which Palestine has in it is forced in every particular. Moreover the language of Constantinople is wholly Turkish, while that of Palestine is wholly Arabic. The language of Egypt is likewise Arabic. Language, climate, commerce, all testify that the Holy Land is wrongly placed.

This is not a specially new idea, nor is it brought forward as such, but to remind the reader how unfortunate the situation is. More than half a century ago, a serious attempt was made for a redistribution of territory. The late Ibrahim Pasha was then in power and in 1831 he conquered Palestine for the Turks. In 1833 it was formally ceded to Egypt.

This was a great thing to do in the line of racial harmony and political justice, but for some reason the arrangement was not satisfactory to the European powers, and in 1840 an English fleet under Admiral Balfour and Commodore Napier appeared before Acre (near Carmel) and in 6 hours the town was reduced to ruins. Ibrahim and the remnant of his army withdrew from the country. The Turkish government, mediæval, despotic, retrogressive, the sworn enemy of civilization and progress, was in trouble and needed England—proud, Christian England—appeared as usual as her defender. Her act viewed impartially in the light of history was nothing else than a long step backward: it was a political crime. England was prompted, no doubt, by a variety of reasons, but on this, as on many other occasions, one of the principal reasons was Turkey's promise to institute reforms. How strangely England has been deceived in all her intercourse with Turkey! Not once, but many times, Turkey has fallen on her knees before England and said: "I am in trouble again: I have been despotic and cruel. I have been a great robber and oppressor of my people, and am suffering the consequences: but just help me and I will promise good behavior in the future. I will surely and at once set about governing better, and you will soon see the improvement." England, on her part, has often responded to the nations of Europe: "Turkey is really sincere: we believe she will change her methods of government; she will soon be all that we desire, wise, economical, and just to all races and religions within her borders, and we must give her a fair trial." For centuries the world has heard these worthless promises and seen the foremost Christian nation on the globe believing these lies.

The land of Palestine is a little safer than it was fifty years ago, but the taxes are as burdensome and are collected with the same severities as ever, the difficulties in the way of securing justice in the courts are just as great, internal improvements are always discouraged, roads are not opened and markets are not provided, there is the same chronic and bitter hostility to foreign schools and civilizing influences, the processes of decay are not arrested, there is the same blighting curse of poverty, misery, and wretchedness everywhere.

Egypt herself has always had a hard struggle against adverse influences exerted from Constantinople, which have kept her poor and depressed, as she was not able alone to assert her independence. It is only since England's policy became dominant in 1882 that the Nile Valley has started on a career of prosperity. Egypt is an example of what England can accomplish if her influence is properly exerted; and the Christian world wonders why it could not have been exerted in a try at once, every school would be closed, and every church would be levelled. We ought to be profoundly thankful that she is powerless to carry out her wishes in this respect.

It is next to impossible to make a stranger realize that in Jerusalem international politics and religion are inseparably connected. We do not expect a religious war between ourselves and England, nor do we expect such a thing between England and France, but in Jerusalem such a war may break out at any moment. The sects are numerous and the jealousy with which they regard each other is with difficulty suppressed.

There are the Greek Orthodox, the Greek Catholic, the Armenian, Syrian, Coptic, Abyssinian, and Protestant, besides two sorts of Mohammedans and three sorts of Jews. These are the principal sects. Besides these there are a considerable number of people who are not Mohammedans or Jews and who do not belong to any existing body of Christians, but who, nevertheless, claim to be religious and who are popularly and properly classed under the head of "cranks." Of the recognized bodies of Christians, the Greeks and Latins are the largest and both control a great deal of property.

Omitting the smaller sects, the representatives of these two great churches guard the holy places in the most jealous manner. The feeling between them is coming under my own observation. A bit of the flooring in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem needed repairing, and the cost of doing it would have been small. It came at a point where the territory of the Greeks and Latins joined. The governor told me that he had spent hours with the representatives of these two bodies and their consular backers, over this matter: if one party repaired it they would claim jurisdiction over it, and the same with the other party. Moreover neither party would allow the governor to repair it, although he would have been glad to do so at his own expense. He said it was with difficulty that he kept the parties from flying at each others' throats the feeling was so strong between them. It was not only a few priests and monks, Greeks and Latins, but France and Russia that were quarreling over a bit of worthless pavement.

About three years since, a party was being conducted through the Grotto of the Nativity in the church (of the same name) at Bethlehem, when opposition was made by some of the monks. The kawass (guard) who was conducting the party, and one of the monks drew their pistols at the same instant and both fired. One monk was killed and another was seriously wounded. The consuls at Jerusalem were at once notified, and the place was full of commotion. The characters in this tragedy were strangely mixed as to nationality. The kawass was a Russian subject, in the official employment of the Austrian government. The man killed was an Italian under French protection. Four great European powers brought into collision within a few feet of the birth place of Christ! Turkey, a fifth power, was interested because the deed took place upon her soil. The most serious consequences were expected, and an international outbreak was certainly imminent. It required the most skillful diplomatic engineering at Rome, Paris, Vienna, St. Petersburg and Constantinople to prevent a catastrophe.

I must not give further illustrations, but my judgment based upon close observation, and many facts convinces me that the elements of an Eastern question are smoldering in Jerusalem. France would give anything for a foothold in Syria, consequently she works political schemes with one hand and religious schemes with the other. Russia, even if she secures Constantinople, will not be satisfied till the land of Israel is dotted with her churches, and the empire of David and Solomon is brought under her sway. Germany, on her part, will not allow her strong colonies in Palestine to be interfered with. And Turkey, with her vast conscripted unpaid army, not a man of which knows what patriotism means, poor Turkey, will make the greatest sacrifices before she will allow one of her provinces to be absorbed by a foreign power.

GENERAL VIEW OF ACRE, FROM THE SEA.

like beneficent manner for Palestine.

During the quarter of a century since my first visit to Palestine, there have been many changes in the country and in the condition of the people. It must be emphasized, however, that these changes are only slight ones. Palestine has been talked about as no other small section of the globe has been. Eight hundred or twelve hundred of our countrymen running all over the Holy Land every year have rubbed the scales from many Oriental eyes. From Mount Lebanon clear down to the desert the people of the country know what Americans are. They know that the name "America" means money, progress, ideas, push, and hope for anybody who is willing to work. The entire inert mass of human life there has been leavened by American schools. We must not take exclusive credit to ourselves for this leaven, for Palestine is filled with English tourists as well as American, and there are besides a fair number annually of Germans, Austrians, French, Swedes, and Belgians. Foreign influence has crowded in and is felt everywhere, and this in spite of the slowness of the Oriental mind and the unfriendliness of the government. The Turkish government knows what is going on, and it is not strange that it regards this restive spirit which is beginning to be manifest in Palestine, with great solicitude. Had she the power, Turkey would compel every foreigner to leave the country at once, every school would be closed, and every church would be levelled. We ought to be profoundly thankful that she is powerless to carry out her wishes in this respect. It is next to impossible to make a stranger realize that in Jerusalem international politics and religion are inseparably connected. Of the recognized bodies of Christians, the Greeks and Latins are the largest and both control a great deal of property. Omitting the smaller sects, the representatives of these two great churches guard the holy places in the most jealous manner. The feeling between them is always intense and outbursts of fanaticism are not infrequent. A busy man in one of our churches at home, or in one of our places of business, will no doubt wonder how a quarrel between Greeks and Latins in Bethlehem or Jerusalem, could be of the slightest interest to the civilized world; but such a person needs to be reminded that less than fifty years ago, an apparently trifling affair connected with these very (so-called) holy places led to the Crimean war. There is no lack of combustible materials now ready and liable at any moment to flame up and spread consternation and ruin far and wide. This is not an assertion made at random, for I have resided in Jerusalem in an official capacity for eight years and have studied this question from inside sources, and I know that my statement instead of exaggerating does not fully represent the real danger.

But, it is asked, how are the great nations of Europe mixed up with these local and trifling affairs? It must be remembered that all the interests of the Greek Church are under the care of Russia. To touch one of the little ones of this faith is enough to shake that great empire. In like manner all Catholic interests are under the care of France—even the Italians who are of this church. Religious and political protection are one and the same thing.

THE KING'S HIGHWAY

A STORY OF THE BROADER CHRIST-LIFE

CHAPTER VI—Continued.

"What is this heart of mine?"

HAT shall it say?" inquired Mrs. Lloyd, eagerly.

"First," replied Mr. Telford, "it might tell you to pull down those shameful old tenements in H—street, from which you derive so much yearly income. They are responsible for incredible suffering, and incredible wrong and crime. Send for architects and let them devise homes in which men and women and children may be able to live like human beings. Remember, if they can't pray, they can wash; and cleanliness is a kind of godliness, and leads to higher things."

This suggestion, received with enthusiasm by Mrs. Lloyd, was strenuously opposed by her husband. "Our poor," he said, "are mostly Irish, and they like to crowd. If they wanted decent homes, capital would flow into building them, just as it flows into building saloons and beer gardens." When arguments failed he tried scorn and anger; and finally such arts of affection as might once have availed, but which were now only to be placed among the futile efforts on which are stamped those sad, ineffectual words—Too Late!

She took no counsel of him, but with wise deliberation carried out the plan suggested. Her time was occupied with architects and philanthropists of various kinds, and she threw off as she might have a crown off a garment the mysticism and solitude which had been for years the air she had loved to breathe. "A more excellent way has been shown me," she said; and she renewed even her physical youth in its invigorating action and sympathies.

She talked much to John on the subject and he was always ready to prevent the material side of her efforts claiming too much for themselves. For there was a tendency in the work she had put her hand to leading to the exaltation of mere human means, and John regarded this as a distinct lowering of that Brotherhood which he was always advocating—

"If we are to love humanity and labor for its welfare," he said, "then we must look at humanity from its noblest destiny and responsibilities. We must consider that man is not only a citizen of this world, but an inheritor of the Kingdom of heaven. Comfortable houses, good food, perfect drainage and education, are but means to a loftier end. For man is not a mere animal to be cultured and cared for, so that he may get through life as pleasantly as possible, and then be done with it; he is the child of God, made for eternal life, and all our loving service for him must be based on our love for God."

"You mean that from the fatherhood of God must spring the brotherhood of man?" asked Mrs. Lloyd.

"Yes," answered John. "This is the great charter of our salvation, that first we love God with all our heart, and soul, and mind; then, without fail, we shall love our neighbor as ourselves. And if any man or woman, Christian, Jew, Buddhist, Mohammedan, reach this height, that man or woman has attained unto salvation."

In this way, and through such conversation, she was prevented from falling into those extremes of feeling which usually attend conversions of any kind, for coming directly out of the cloud of mysticism into the vivid day of actuality and labor, it was very difficult for her not to overrate the importance of the work growing so visible under her care and generosity.

Nearly before a summer passed so quickly and pleasantly to Mrs. Lloyd. She was surrounded when Alice became restless and anxious to get back to the city, yet, as soon as the subject was taken up by her own mind, she was equally eager to go. She would be nearer to her work—nearer to her lawyer and adviser—nearer to the people whom she was bent on benefiting. So the early days of October saw the large house on the avenue opened again, and Mrs. Lloyd and her daughter, each through their own hopes and desires, looking forward to a winter that should answer all their expectations.

Jessie also was gratified. She was very unwilling to give up her pupil, but she was quite elated over her first visit to the Lloyd city house. It was an exceedingly handsome home, and satisfied her conception of a rich man's dwelling. Its stately splendor reflected a sort of honor on her; she even fancied it influenced Alice, that it made her more reticent and dignified, and less inclined to familiarity and confidences. But if there was any truth in this fancy, it arose from circumstances hardly realized even by Alice herself.

The girl had quickly found that John in the city, was much more frequently present, and she feared the constant proximity. Some days Mr. Lloyd did not go to his office at all, and John brought the correspondence to him and answered the letters at the house. Then he usually dined with them, remaining with his employer an hour or two afterwards, occupied with business, or sometimes attending the ladies to an entertainment or passing the evening with them in their own drawing-room. And Alice had reached that stage of love when love is silent and shy, because it has come to understand that all of life's joy is in the power of another. Undoubtedly Alice loved John with the sweet fervor that marks a first affection, and yet she was not free from reservations and little social anxieties. And she knew well how angry her father would be at the destruction of all his hopes regarding Lord Medway, while she was hardly certain that he would visit his anger on John.

Also, she was not oblivious of what her friends and acquaintances would say; and it was easier to contemplate their opinions in the country than in their very presence, surrounded by all the circumstances which gave authority to social judgments. There were also hours in which she suffered from the uncertainties of love—when she wondered if her love would bear John's steady and increasing devotion to ideas which she did not altogether approve—hours when Jessie's intimacies fretted her sense of what was perfectly high-bred and lady-like; and when the thought of John's family, and its possible intrusions, was not endurable. So she was often depressed, as those must be in whom perfect love has not cast out fear.

These feelings certainly found no expression in words, but they made an atmosphere which Jessie felt and resented so far as to retire promptly into her position as teacher, a position Alice appeared to be quite ready to accept. But this appearance was in reality the indifference which Alice felt to all other subjects but the great one which was to decide her future life. Her feelings toward Jessie had not changed; it was the constant growth of feeling regarding John which compelled her to assume that veil of dignified calm, behind which she hid all emotion, but which Jessie thought the result of pride, of self-appreciation. Others had the same opinion, for "what airs Alice Lloyd puts on since that affair with Lord Medway," was a very usual comment of visitors at the Lloyd dwelling.

One November day, just as the lamps were being lit on the avenue, Jessie came down the steps of this dwelling with an angry heart. "I will give no more lessons in that house," she said to herself. "Alice has become 'Miss Lloyd' with emphasis. She is decidedly changed. She has put on city airs. She thinks I shall expect to be invited to her entertainments, and that it is necessary to snub me in advance. Pooh! I want nothing she has, or can give me;—then she laughed a little to herself, and added, "Yes, I want her money for my labor; and I won't throw that away for a little false pride. Oh, dear, I wish! I wish!—I wish I did not have to teach!"

But the smile of her mother as she entered the house, the cheerful supper-table, the glowing fire in the little grate, put all dissatisfaction quickly out of her mind. As she took off her wraps and brushed back her hair, she heard her father and John coming up the stairs together. "After all," she told herself, "I have John! Alice wants him, but she can't make up her mind to accept him with his etceteras of unfashionable opinions and unfashionable relations. And I wouldn't change places with her if I had to change my opinions and my relations. John is worth twenty of her! Who are the Lloyds, anyway?"

She put down her brush with considerable accent and went into the dining-room humming a melody that had sprung from her heart as an unconscious explanation of her mood. As soon as she entered the room, it stopped suddenly. Steve stood in the middle of the floor watching her, and the next moment he was holding her hands, while a thousand joys and hopes and John had business with Mr. Lloyd and Mr. and Mrs. McAslin remained together in the dining-room, there seemed to be a propitious arrangement by which Steve and Jessie had the parlor to the selves. Steve went there with his purpose plainly written on his face. Jessie hid intelligence of the position under a pre-access of vanity in her new and precious belongings. But all pretences fell away when they stood alone. Steve made attempt to delay his fate. He said simply yet with great tenderness,

"Jessie, you know how truly I love you. What have you to say to me?" And the words Jessie said went like wine to Steve's head and heart, and he took her in his arms and answered with truest, fondest kisses.

"Oh, you dear, dear girl! God bless you, Jessie! I will try from this instant to be worthy of you!"

CHAPTER VII.

STEVE'S OPPORTUNITY.

The man who cuts himself loose from the organized prejudices of his time and contemporaries is always regarded as a fool, and Steve could not escape this verdict, even from those who loved him. He did not give him serious trouble. He knew that the world in general looked on matters as "foolishness," which the Eternal that makes for righteousness holds to the highest wisdom; and his simple, wandering life had been only in accord with that stream of tendency by which things seek to fulfil the law of their being.

For freedom he had joyfully given home, and kindred, and great wealth, to escape the trammels of conventional life he had been content to work with hands for such things as were necessary for his existence. The religious doubts which assailed thoughtful youths had been conquered, not in a natural, disputatious attitude, but on his knees in desert places among woods and mountains, when he was alone with the Solitudes and wide horizons had given to his mind an equal plenitude. "If it is possible to believe too much in God," he once said to John, "I desire to be guilty of that sin." His faith in God was equally wide. His opinions were large, hopeful, honest. They did not turn into insinuations, nor were they ambushed in plausibility; he put them boldly forward and asked no quarter for them.

Such a man was not likely to let love dominate him; he was challenged. He was sure of the long run to inquire of his tendencies—how it would influence, and where it would lead him. So it was, that the loneliness and storm of the Baltic shores, and in the heavily beauty of the Mediterranean, he had to live out, during the past summer, the greatest battle a man can fight, as regards this life—the battle between the absolute freedom that was his soul's highest atmosphere and the captivating love, that was his heart's sweetest hope.

Freedom had nearly won him many times; perhaps if he had remained in the stress and storm of the bleak, tossing Baltic, for a little longer freedom would have gained the final victory; but under the soft Italian skies, in the warm sunshine of the South, loved the atmosphere of its being. Memories of Jessie floated in the perfumed air, and in its lovely languors, he dreamed only of her beauty and brightness, and thus love easily won the day.

A change, therefore, in his whole life had to be contemplated. He had to decide whether he would be his wife, and she had to decide whether she would be his. He was sensible to his request; and he was aware, that marriage meant a home, and all its attendant cares and responsibilities. He would have to shut himself once within four walls. He would be compelled to perform some regular work. He would be obliged to live day after day, in the same place. No more wanderings, no more length and breadth of the land, no more sleeping and dreaming under the stars, with his knapsack for a pillow. He had taken one dear, lovely woman to his heart; and he must take with her the cares as well as all the joys which inevitably brings.

"WHAT HAVE YOU TO SAY TO ME?" ASKED STEVE.

lit up his beaming face. They met in each other's arms, the meeting being perfectly unconsidered and natural. Before either of them were aware of the act Steve had kissed her. He had called her "dear Jessie." He had led her with the air of one who had the right of possession to the chair beside his own. And then he slipped into her hands a little box full of ornaments made of amber from the Baltic Sea, amber that looked like crystallized sunshine, and a coral comb for her hair that he had bought in Naples, and a set of rich laces from the Isle of Malta.

Jessie was delighted. What woman is insensible to presents, especially such presents as are for the adornment of her beauty? She could not eat her supper. She ran into her room and came out brilliant with amber glory and silky, white lace. Then Steve could not eat for very admiration of her; and their joy spread as fire spreads, and every heart was aflame with love and friendship, and the delight of welcome for one who had been far away and had come back to his home again.

Nothing explicit had been said, and yet every member of the family felt that Jessie and Steve belonged to each other, and as Flora was visiting her betrothed's sister, OPPORTUNITIES.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning Mar. 7. John 4:5-15. 1Cor.9:19-22.

ALTHOUGH Christianity lays stress upon being, rather than on doing, it is only as means to an end. It secures the doing of good by insisting on the being good. James seems to put the matter logically when he says: "Show me thy faith without thy works, and I will show thee my faith by my works." But Paul is the better logician, because works are not always a proof of faith. There are many examples of good works being done for a noble purpose. They may be done, we know, under some vague idea of accumulating merit, or of gaining popularity, or from generous impulses which can exist in a soul which has no faith at all. We are thankful for a good deed whatever it may have been the motive that prompted it, but when we come to examine our own performances, it is important to discriminate. Again and again we are warned that motive enters into the account when God judges our conduct. Christ said of the Pharisees that they had received their reward. They wanted the applause of men, they sought their good deeds to obtain it, and even when they did obtain it, the account was balanced and they had no reason to look for any further recognition. The Christian who acts on Christ's principles does good to the unthankful and the evil, renders service to his enemies, denies himself for the sake of people who will show no gratitude and makes no parade of his benefaction. What he does, he does for Christ's sake and in Christ's spirit. He does it out of the goodness of his heart and with no expectation of reward. The surprise with which those on the right hand of the Judge heard that in feeding the hungry and visiting the sick, they had been ministering to Christ, indicates the spontaneity and disinterestedness of their service. It is on this radical principle that Christianity provides for good works. It implants in the heart the disposition of helpfulness and kindness and love, and the disposition to seek its own way in a world where so much of those qualities is needed. Where this disposition exists it will never be idle. Though a man be so poor that his own absolute necessities are barely met, he may minister to others, by an encouraging smile and the sympathetic word cost nothing, yet they may give new life into some soul that is faint under the burden of life. Suffering and sorrow are on every hand, and it is our business to relieve them. Every dark hour is an opportunity for those who are in the light of the world. At school, in the home, in the office and the store, there is opportunity for ministry. The cheerful disposition and the ready hand may do much to help others bear their burdens. The curse of competition, the struggle of ambition, the eagerness to "push to the front," the desire to secure good things of life for ourselves, the marks of the spirit which is in antagonism to Christ. Where they reign, opportunities pass unseen, and even our cries are unheeded. The eye needs to be taken from our own interests and to our own advantage before it can detect the need of others. The surgeon who has an anæsthetic for a sickness goes where that sickness is prevalent that he may relieve it. How much more the Christian, whose heart is full of the sweet peace that comes from union with Christ, should seek opportunities to tell his secret to others. So, from closing his eyes to the opportunities that force themselves on his attention, he will go where he is likely to find opportunities, and think how best he can use them. Much of the harassing introduction which embitters the spiritual life may might be avoided by this active distraction. "Am I saved? Shall I be saved?" are questions that torment thousands. But if the mind were occupied with an effort to help some other soul to the light, to cheer some sufferer, to console some mourner, to lift the burden from the weary back if only for an hour, the devil would cease its tormenting self-questioning.

SOUL LONGINGS.

O TO be trusted and trusty,
O to be faithful and true;
Lovingly serving my Captain,
Always prepared for review.
O to be just where he wants me
There in his presence to stand
Willing to do to the utmost
Aught he may please to command.
O to be fully surrendered,
Never a will of my own;
All of my life for his kingdom,
All of my heart for his throne.
Thus to be guided entirely
By the sweet counsel of grace;
Never a word to oppose him,
Never a thought to displace.
O to be filled with the Spirit,
Emptied of dross and of tin;
Filled with the wonderful fullness,
Sanctified thoroughly from sin.
So to be more than a conqueror;
Never a moment of loss—
Never a shadow of failure
In the Crusade of the Cross.
Lord, to provide me this blessing
Is a small matter with thee;

Here would I claim thine own promise,
Claim it as given to me.
Bring I the tithes and the offerings,
All at thy pierced feet I pour;
Open the windows of heaven—
Bless me as never before.

JOHN WILFRID MCCLURE.

A LITTLE WAY.

WHAT though with weariness oppressed—
'Tis but a little, and we rest.
This throbbing heart and burning brain
Will soon be calm and cool again.
Night is far spent and morn is near—
Morn of the cloudless and the clear:
No vanity nor folly now,
No fading garland round our brow;
No moody musings in the grove,
No pang of disappointed love;
With the brave heart and steady eye
We onward march to victory.
'Tis but a little, and we come
To our reward, our crown, our home!
Another year, it may be less,
And we have crossed the wilderness,
Finished the toil, the rest begun,
The battle fought, the triumph won!

THE PRESENT AGE.

Characteristics of our Time by which we Recognize its Place in Prophecy.

BY REV. GEORGE C. NEEDHAM.

THE saddest peculiarity of present scoffers is that they appear not to know that the very reason of the Lord's delay is because of long-suffering toward themselves. Just as ample time was given to the mockers of Noah's age, so now Jesus is waiting in the heavens, if peradventure some of these wicked will turn from their ways and escape wrath.

Another feature of these scoffers is lack of moral character. They are not good men or sober men. Their testimony is worth nothing, for they are given over to sin, and therefore to blindness of heart.

It is an anti-Christian age. Not outwardly so in Christianized lands, but inwardly in all that pertains to the heart and life. We cannot better demonstrate this statement than by quoting from a lecture delivered in a theatre in Yokohama by a distinguished Buddhist priest on his return from the Parliament of Religions convened in Chicago during the World's Fair. Amid great applause he said: "The Parliament was called because the Western nations have come to realize the weakness and folly of Christianity and they really wished to hear from us of our religion, and to learn what the best religion is. There is no better place in the world to propagate the teachings of Buddhism than in America. . . . Christianity is merely an adornment of society in America. It is deeply believed in by very few. The great majority of Christians drink and commit various gross sins, and live very dissolute lives, although it is a very common belief and serves as a social adornment. Its lack of power proves its weakness."

The startling statement of what a stranger saw and felt in a Christianized land, may well set the faithful in the church to sober consideration. Perhaps we shall learn that Paul and John were not wrong when they predicted that the spirit of lawlessness should increase as time moved on; and that a "falling away" should characterize the last days. (II. Thess. 11: 1-4.)

It is estimated that less than thirty per cent. of our population are regular attendants upon church, while one-half of the whole population of the United States never attend any church of any name. Other Christianized lands yield an even more discouraging census.

Do any ask what shall be the final result? Scripture alone can answer. "The Spirit speaketh expressly that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils. Speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their conscience seared with a hot iron (I Tim. 4:1-2)

And again, "This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unholy, without natural affection, trucebreakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, highminded, lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God; having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof." (II. Tim. 3: 1-5.) Mark the coincidence between the words of that heathen priest and the inspired apostle. One says: "Christianity is merely an adornment of society . . . deeply believed in by very few. The other says: "Having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof."

It is a mixed age. Wheat and tares grow together; good and bad fishes are in the same drag-net; sheep and goats are herded together; wise and foolish virgins are found in each other's company; and evil birds lodge in the branches of the mustard tree of the kingdom.

These are the rough outlines as sketched by the hand of prophecy. We can see how the latter-day Church is filling in the details of the picture. Active Christianity is barely holding its own in running a race with active sin.

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE.

Winter Days in Florida.

A Frost-Pinched Orchard—Alligators as a Source of Income.

SUALLY a Floridian winter is a season of salubrious mildness. It is very seldom that the mercury touches the freezing point, and zero is quite unheard of, even by the oldest inhabitant, while snow is something about which the Florida mothers tell their children as being a product peculiar to northern localities. Yet Florida occasionally feels the pinch of Jack Frost, although not with a marked degree of severity; but even the slightest degree is a thing to be dreaded by the owners of the beautiful orange groves in the Flowery State. One of the photographs on this page shows how serious are the results of a visit by the "frost-king" in that state. The picture is that of an orange grove on the beautiful Indian River, where great quantities of the fruit, frost-bitten over night, have fallen from the heavily-laden trees to the ground. It is a pitiful sight for the orange-grower. He, perhaps, may have built all his hopes of profit for the year on that particular crop, which is now ruined in a single night,—the trees stripped almost bare, the fruit rotten and flavorless, fit only for the refuse heap. Sometimes it happens that a frost-wave, passing over an orange-growing section, will kill immense quantities of the fruit, involving damage to the extent of hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Fortunately such visitations are exceptional, and when they do come they usually affect only a limited section. Within the last ten years Florida fruit-growers have suffered considerably from frost; but a single fortunate season may reimburse them for the loss of the bad crop of the previous year.

Another of our illustrations is one that will be full of special interest for our young readers. Alligator hunting in the Southern swamps and bayous is not without its attendant dangers; but young alligators are so easily caught without much risk. This is particularly the case when they have been a touch of frost, which seems to make them and render them helpless. They are then roped around the neck and around the body and they can be handled. Last year a collector in the Indian River section of the State as a friend tells us, saw one dollar per foot, and was so lucky as to get a good one, and a very small one. The boy in the photograph is a side to the coast in the Indian River section of the State.

netting a dollar a foot. The skin is used for making shoes, slippers, satchels and purses, and good skins are in active demand. For these purposes the young alligators are preferred, as the skin is pliant and more easily handled.

Florida is every year becoming more popular with Northern tourists and invalids, who go there at this season to escape the rigors of our Northern winter. It is a delightful and health-giving country in winter, rich in scenery and full of picturesque variety. For hunters, fishermen and naturalists, it is a veritable Paradise.

Discontented People.

As long as there are thoughtless women there will be discontented wives. As long as there are careless men there will be discontented husbands. Because the rich man wears patent leather shoes and fine clothes, and indulges in expensive habits and luxurious living, the well-to-do laborer of limited means thinks he must do so too. Because the wives of the rich rustle in silk and diamonds, and pay fifteen dollars to have a dress made, the poor man's wife, unless she is possessed of that very uncommon and most desirable thing, common sense, sighs because she cannot do likewise. How great the truth expressed by the apostle when he wrote, "Godliness with contentment is great gain." The most perfect image of a saint to be seen in this world is the happy, Majesty packed a large case of dollies and dishes—all in a fair state of preservation—and had them sent off to the little sufferers. The sick children are always told who sends the presents, and in past years this has resulted in the saving of some curious and interesting relics. In this way the battered tin soldiers which amused the childhood of old Kaiser William have been saved from the wreck of time.

A Japanese Tea-Party.

In a letter from Japan to What to Eat, Mrs. Robert P. Porter gives this pretty picture of a tea-party in the Mikado's kingdom: "Conducted into a spacious suite of apartments, furnished in European style, and terminating in a long drawing-room, we found we had been bidden to a family party, an honor to be greatly appreciated. Here was the aged mother, her white hair shaven clean, like that of a priest, and her bent form clad in the darkest of blue silk kimonos. Our host, too, wore his native costume, the long flowing lines of his gray silk gown giving added dignity to his fine face and upright carriage. He led Madame forward, calm, gracious, and wearing the subdued colors of her age and position. Then two charm-

HIS WAY IS BEST.

THE snows of winter nurse the hop corn; Long, patient months produce the harvest fair; The darkling clouds the sunset's throne pare; 'Mid glacier crags are noblest rivers born; The tempest tracks the mountain's adorn; In deepest mines are treasured gems rare; The port is calmer reached through stormy care; The night of weeping melts in joyful morn; Events are not as first they meet the sight; The sons of God by passing griefs are blest; Amid the dark he ever leads to light; His purposes and plans are always right; Commit thy way to him, his way is best.

Attractive Firesides.

WHY is it that in some homes parents seem to have no cult in making their sons daughters happy and agree preferring to spend their leisure under family roof-tree, rather than to wander in strange places, where other households the young people seem to have a chronic aversion to pass any more time at home than is necessary for purposes of eating and sleeping? This is no overdrawn picture; many parents know their sorrow. Perhaps can best find out the son by going to the young folks themselves about it. "Our home," says a lad, "is one in which there is always plenty of light, plenty of light, plenty of light, and a good fire; a boy is happiest when a good fire. Rooms should be warm, and there should be light in every corner which is a great thing for boys. Warmth and light are good, but there should also be, for both boys and girls, a supply of books, magazines, and such amusements. There is nothing in this whole creation half so well as saving as the boys and girls.

Imagine a community of young people, says a girl in The Kingdom, busy up with a pleasant morning place where they can pass their spare time in chatter, music, game, and the society of bright and intelligent people. Picture this evening, a young man to-morrow afternoon stereopticon talk and next week, and all through the year interesting and events interesting and instructive, something to look forward to, something to make the time pass agreeably to brighten the daily life of young people to whom a dull, workaday world is monotonous and dispiriting.

Wash-day in Sweden.

Wash-day has terrors for the Swedish girl. It comes only once a month, after a pile of accumulated garments may have been imagined than described. The no stationary tubs, washing machines, wringers. Five or six women, professional washers, come in and begin to scrub and rub. Each piece is put through the process in three separate waters. The first pour boiling water on the white garment thirteen times in succession, and finally then he over night in a weak lye mixture, pouring water through a bag containing soap and wood ashes. Next morning the tubs are placed on a sledge and drawn by a horse to the public wash-house, where the women take garment after garment and beat it with a paddle, holding one hand in a trough, through which a stream of water. The wash is then back into the tubs and hauled home.

In all, there were four generations. A few Japanese gentlemen, whose names are well-known to the scientific world, were also invited. We were shown a wonderful collection of netsukes, gems in carved ivory, metal and precious woods, and tasted of the beautiful bonbons, that in the form of a basket of fruit and flowers were passed around. Then we were invited upstairs into another large suite of apartments, where a unique and delightful entertainment was given. Famous conjurers fanned bits of white paper into clouds of snowy butterflies, and gave us a drama on wings in a butterfly courtship. A New Use for Old Toys.

There are many excellent uses to which old toys might be put after the children have become tired of them. A pretty custom which prevails in the German royal family, illustrates this: On the birthday of one of the children the Empress goes through the stock of toys which has been accumulating since the child's last birthday, and sends all, except a few special favorites, to the sick children in hospitals. On the occasion of little Princess Victoria Louise's birthday recently, her

MORE MORMON FALLACIES.

Eaton Replies to Many Critical Correspondents — The Real Mormon Doctrines about God and Christ Explained.

URING the publication of the series of articles on Mormonism, in these pages, from the pen of Gen. John Eaton, a recognized authority on the subject, a large number of letters were received from persons in different parts of the country, some of them taking issue with the author regarding the statements made in his contributions. These letters were placed at Gen. Eaton's disposal for answer, and we print below his communications in reply, which will shortly be followed by another, dealing with a different branch of the correspondence.

WASHINGTON, D.C., Feb. 10, 1897. Supplementing my half dozen articles on Mormonism, as required by the numerous communications received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and by the writer, it is impossible to take up each in detail, for time nor space permitting. The numerous communications shows the great interest in the subject. They come from many different sections, indicating not only the extensive circulation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but expressing the greatest confidence in its fairness. In general it may be said the letters divided themselves into two classes: those which approve and those which deny in part the statements made. Some express surprise at the amount of data the writer has in his possession. Some ask more specifications. Any one who has dealt with a subject of this kind so briefly, knows how often space permits only general treatment, forbidding the use of details or exceptions. Some criticised omission of data in the earlier articles found their points duly noted and in their order, later.

The writer may say for himself that he had exceptional opportunity to understand Mormonism, its origin, progress, and present condition, and, from most mature consideration, believes it without foundation or revelation, false in doctrine as a religion and injurious in practice to our civilization and piety. Yet his purpose in these articles was in accord with the well-known character of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, only to bring out the truth and rely on its effect; not a word put down in unkindness towards any one. He believes in the honesty of the body of Mormons and would accord every reader the same freedom of religious belief as he enjoys himself—the same guarantee to every citizen by the American Constitution. Mormonism must stand or fall on its merits. Those who are in it seek by greater and greater pretension to confirm themselves; those who do not believe in it, find ever increasing reason for rejecting it. This latter the writer believes will be the result in every case where the question is approached lightly and candidly. He may say the most severe terms in the letters against him, purported to come from one of the gentler sex, eighty years old, who takes this as an illustration of the perversion accomplished by the rites and practice of Mormonism. The statement of the doctrines of Mormonism in the previous articles, sustained by accurate quotations from authoritative exponents, which the writer deemed the most serious of the charges made by the articles, are confirmed by the most credible witnesses. Among the illustrations of the fact that are found in the later articles what they charged the writer with omitting, is the truth that the "Josephites" do not practice polygamy, which came out clearly in its place. The articles do not take up the divisions already arising among the followers of Joseph Smith. They make much of the divisions among professed Christians; they use these facts to prove that the time has come for the Latter-Day Saints to possess the earth. I did not bring out the bitterness that has been manifested between the "Josephites" and the "Brighamites," so-called, nor did I mention the failure of all recent efforts to bring them together, nor did I dwell upon the other divisions, and I may now add that the recent efforts to harmonize the "Reorganized Church of the Latter-Day Saints" and the "Hendrickites" have also failed. I have before me the doctrines of the Brighamites as declared by Joseph Smith in the thirteen articles, recently reaffirmed by Wilford Woodruff, and as printed on the back of the personal card used by the Brighamite missionaries, and I have also a copy of the articles of faith of the Josephites, as approved by their secretary, Elder H. A. Stebbins, of their headquarters, Lamoni, Decatur Co., Iowa. The Josephites declare specifically that they believe "in marriage as ordained by God," but that the doctrine of plural marriages is "heresy," and they affirm that freedom of worship "does not require a violation of the constitutional law of the land." As to the doctrine of polygamy, fidelity to history makes it necessary to say that Brigham Young declared that the doctrine was revealed to Joseph Smith years before it was made public, and further it should be stated that the belief prevailed among those outside of Mormon circles that celestial marriage, so-called, was practiced in the days of Joseph Smith; indeed the general public was profoundly convinced of the practice of immorality among the Mormon leaders before they left Nauvoo.

It is well understood that the missionaries from Utah have not included polygamy among the first doctrines declared where they preach. Polygamy has had its fullest development in Utah, where Mormon leaders were supreme. Many are now known never to have given up its practice, and there is a deep conviction in the minds of many non-Mormons that there is to be a general return to the practice of plural marriages, as soon as it can be done without too severe a shock to the public mind. In confirming this view, they point first to the fact that they personally know of many families living in polygamous relations; second, the doctrine of plural marriages fundamental to the Mormon system; third, that it never has been excluded from the revised editions of their compendium of faith; fourth that (a) the "manifesto" suspending plural marriages was only issued and (b) the clause prohibiting them, which was inserted in the constitution, were only for the purpose of securing statehood; fifth, the well known fact that the Constitution of the United States does not prohibit polygamy, that the subject of marriage is left entirely to each of the states, is cited as showing that the Mormon sentiment has now an open way in Utah to follow its own direction; sixth, what that direction is, it is claimed, is indicated by the fact that the first legislature under statehood, as has already been cited, (a) made all children born in polygamous families legitimate and (b) refused to pass any law punishing plural marriages; seventh, it is affirmed that the leaders, having found a way to continue the control of the church in temporal as well as spiritual affairs, thus violating their pledges and the spirit of the state constitution for which they voted, will also find a way to practice polygamy, a doctrine so fundamental in their system.

With reference to the use by Mormon preachers and writers of the terms "God" and "Faith" and "Jesus Christ" in a sense in which they are not used among Christian people, a single illustration must suffice. Elder B. H. Roberts, a man greatly respected among Mormons, who has written various books in support of their doctrines, the last of which is entitled, "A New Witness for God," in a discourse delivered before Christian people in Salt Lake City, April 5th, 1896, said: "But I do mean the young man who is deep in his religious convictions, and who, in the presence of unbeliever and believer alike, modestly affirms his belief in Jesus Christ, and brings the principle of Jesus Christ into practice in every-day life." Who would find fault with this declaration if the terms are accepted in their commonly-received meaning? But what they mean to Mormons, will appear if we turn to his "A New Witness for God," page 465, where he says: "The Prophet Joseph Smith corrected the idea that God that now is was always God. We have imagined," said he, "and supposed that God was God from all eternity. I will refute that idea and take away the veil so that you can see. . . . God himself was one as we are now, and is an exalted man and sits enthroned in yonder heaven. This is the great secret." Again he says, page 461: "I wish to be perfectly understood here. Let it be remembered that the Prophet Joseph Smith taught that man, that is, his spirit, is the offspring of Deity; not in any mystical sense, but actually; that man has not only a Father in heaven, but a Mother, also. . . . Instead of the God-given power of procreation being one of the chief things that is to pass away, it is one of the chief means of man's exaltation and glory in that great eternity, which like an endless vista stretches out before him! Through it man attains to the glory of an endless increase of eternal lives, and the right of presiding as priest and patriot, king and lord over his ever-increasing posterity. . . . Through that law, in connection with the observance of all the other laws of the Gospel, man will yet attain unto the power of the Godhead, and like his Father—God—his chief glory will be to bring to pass the eternal life and happiness of his posterity." With this man-god doctrine, teaching that Jesus is the God next to the Father, and is and has been building his kingdom with many wives, what becomes of the plausibility in Christian minds of the first quotation, so nearly sound if its terms are interpreted as is usual among our Christian believers! JOHN EATON.

OORFA'S ORPHAN BAND.

The Parentless Children Crowding upon Miss Shattuck—Two Interesting Letters About the Rescue Work.

HEARING news comes to us of the progress of the rescue work among the orphans at Oorta. Miss Chambers, a missionary who has lately gone to that city, writes: "Miss Shattuck seems very tired, and I am very glad I could come. We have united schools with the Gregorians, and have fourteen departments in all, with more than one thousand children, and soon will have twenty teachers. We also will have fourteen Bible women at work, teaching women and grown girls to read. Many more wish to learn as soon as we can arrange with them to have a teacher. These teachers are newly-made widows, and support, or at least partially support, their families by this means. Beside the readers, there are five who hold little meetings and visit the sick. Those who pass a satisfactory examination in reading are allowed to enter a Bible class I conduct every Wednesday morning. Our Sunday School is very large, having sometimes as many as 1,100 children. I have a class of twenty-six large girls. We also have an industrial department, in which we employ a number of persons. I believe there are now one hundred and ten in all. Besides this, we have our orphan boys and girls. We are taking in new ones all the time. Every minute is filled up. There is scarcely time for anything to be thought about or talked over except the work on hand. We have no time to borrow trouble or worry about the future."

Miss Shattuck, writes of one branch of the work: "Our orphans in two homes now number 115; 55 boys are in our own home and the girls in two houses near us; all are healthy children, little suggesting, as one sees them at play, the sad scenes of one year ago. All but seven or eight are in school, and six older boys are learning the shoemaker's trade, working in turn, two by two, one set before school in the early morning, one after school before evening meal, and the other in the time most precious of all for lessons, the evening study time. They are quite enthusiastic in their work, as in their study also. A few are about fourteen or fifteen years of age, and all have lost both father and mother. We have been obliged to enlarge our premises, and the new rooms are nearly ready for occupancy."

In another letter Miss Shattuck writes of expecting a number of additional orphans and of the special need of providing for them. She expresses the warmest gratitude for the help already rendered.

These glimpses of the very energetic work now going on at Oorta only serve to show how busy the workers are, toiling among the orphans and the helpless ones from day to day without cessation. They deserve the most cordial encouragement and support in their efforts.

M.C.A. Progress in India.

A letter published in a recent issue of (by whose courtesy we print the accompanying illustration), an interesting account is given of the proposed Y. M. C. A. building at Madras, the gift of Hon. W. Vanamaker. About two years ago, officers of the Y. M. C. A. while travel-

PROPOSED Y.M.C.A. BUILDING AT MADRAS, INDIA.

In a crowded section of Madras known as blacktown, photographed a piece of ground then covered with old debris and ruins of long uninhabited houses. Within a few months that site was acquired by the Madras Association, and an appeal was made for funds. Mr. Vanamaker generously consented to give the whole amount needed for the superstructure—$30,000. Other gifts, large and small, have been pledged, assuring a sufficient amount to cover the cost of furnishing the building when it is completed.

Requests for Prayer.

The Converts' Sunday Evening Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission, prayer was offered on Feb. 7, in accordance with the requests of many persons, among whom the following ask prayers of our readers:

For the Conversion Reader, Clarendon, Tex., asks prayer for the conversion of two brothers. — "Grate Reader," for the conversion of two friends, one of whom has fallen under the power of an insidious drug may be desired. — J. T. A. Chambersburg, Pa., that a loved brother may give his heart to God. — M. St. Stephen, N. B., for the conversion of three young men. — "Wife and Mother," that her dear husband and son may be brought to Christ, and may be enabled to earn an honest livelihood. — "Distressed Mother," Burlington, Iowa, that five dear brothers might be brought to the Lord and find salvation. — Reader, T. B. C., for the conversion of two sisters and an only brother. — E. F. C., Elkader, Ia., that a whole family, mother, two brothers and a sister might seek and find salvation through Christ. — "Praying Mother," Jacksonville, Minn., for the conversion of a family, husband and five children, especially of one son, whose need of divine grace is very urgent. — M. G., Larimore, N. D., for the conversion of a husband and wife. — "Father," George, N. S. C., that a young man may give himself to the Lord. — W. L., Newark, O., that a son, who is in financial trouble, may realize his redemption of Christ, and may be led to seek first the kingdom of God. — "Anxious Wife," New York, for the conversion of her husband and father. — "A Wife and Daughter," that wife and daughter may cling closer to Christ and have the grace and patience needed. — M. M. H., Tupper Tract, W. Va., that a beloved son may be saved from his bondage to strong drink, and may be led to consecrate his life to God. — M. M., Fort Scott, Kans., for the conversion of husband and children. — "Troughful Wife," Va., for the conversion of her husband. — "Mother," East Pittsfield, Mass., that God would lead her son and his wife to give themselves to him. — A. M. H., Wallingford, Vt., that one who once knew the Lord, but has backslidden, may be brought back and renew his vows of consecration. — "Wife of the Lord," Fulkerson, Me., for the conversion of a son, a cousin, and two young men. — A. E. C., Thompson, O., for the conversion of her husband. — Sunday School teacher North Platte, N.Y., that the boys in her class may all be brought into the fold of Christ. — "Anxious Mother," that her children, sons and three daughters might give themselves to Christ. — "Anxious Mother," Anoka, Minn., that her only son, an unbeliever, living in sin, may turn from his evil ways and seek redemption. — "Waiting Wife," Solon, O., who has been praying thirteen years for the conversion of her husband, begs that Christ will come with her in presenting his case at the throne of Grace. — "Fond Mother," Clinton, N.Y., that her son may be made strong to resist the temptation to strong drink, and that he may give himself to Christ who is able to help him from falling, and that he may be able to pay his way honestly.

For the Restoration L. C. B., Louisville, Ky., asks prayer that God would heal a dear son who is very sick and in danger of consumption. — Reader, Roxborough, for the recovery of a friend, a King's Daughter, who is threatened with blindness. — W. R. K., Jefferson, Mo., that she may be healed of a distressing affliction. — "Anxious Daughter," Frankford, Pa., that God, with whom all things are possible, would restore her beloved mother to health and would prosper an effort on the daughter's part to obtain work for the mother's support. — E. D., Farmer City, Ill., for the restoration to health of a dear son, who is very sick and that he might be led to Christ. — V. E., Stephens, that a friend may be healed. — V. E. Stephens, that a friend who is paralyzed may be healed. — D. E. L., Gresham, Neb., for the recovery of a grandfather who has been stricken with paralysis. — G. W. A., Markleysburg, Pa., that her mother may recover her former health and vigor. — R. C., Charleston, S. C., that a sick sister may be restored to health. — J. H. H., East Orange, N. J., for the restoration of hearing. — L. E. S., Plattville, Wis., that Christ would grant recovery and avert the necessity for a dreaded operation. — C. L. S., Mt. Vernon, Wash., that she and her daughter may regain their health that they may be able to support themselves. — "Anxious Mother," Cape Vincent, N. Y., that a sick daughter may be healed by the power of the Great Physician. — L. A. B., Fairmont, Ind., that an aged infirm Christian woman may be spared recurrent attacks of severe pain. — The following persons afflicted with various maladies ask prayer that the Lord would heal them: H. L. D., Newark, Del.; Lizzie S., Bakersville, Pa.; Subscriber, Mill Village, Pa.; M. B., Brooklyn, N. Y.; A. S., Richmond, Miss.

For Special Blessings. B., Emporia, Kans., asks prayer that her husband may succeed in finding the employment he needs and be enabled to have his family with him and support them. — J. J. S., Slater, Mo., that a worthy family may be enabled to get a home and earn an honest living. — "Distressed Father," Brooklyn, N. Y., that God in his great mercy would enable his son to obtain employment at some place away from New York, where he would be removed from the temptations which overcome him in the great city. — M. P., Randolph, N. C., that a husband and wife who are very unhappy, may be reconciled and may be enabled to live peacefully in mutual love and confidence. — Reader, Montclair, N. J., that he may secure employment so as to be able to maintain his family. — Reader, Central, Pa., that a widow and her daughter may be enabled to collect from the executors of an estate the money that is due them. — S. C. B., Saunsville, Va., a widow who has great difficulty in supporting her young family and is unable to raise a small sum needed to take advantage of an offer of help, asks prayer that God would open the way before her. — "Troubled Child," Brooklyn, N. Y., that she may find out the cause of her spiritual darkness and learn what her duty is as to a promise made to God years ago, but not kept. — "Perplexed," New York, who is suffering misery through falling into sin about a year ago, and is unable to shake off a wrong connection, asks prayer that in some way God would remove from the neighborhood the tempter who holds him to his sin and that God in his mercy would forgive him. — E. C. V., Garden Grove, Cal., that the Lord would hear the many prayers being offered for a small country church and answer them by giving the church peace and power. — "Pastor," Athens, Tex., that God would give him the grace of consecration and revive the church under his charge and bring in many souls into the kingdom. — "Believer," Poughkeepsie, N. Y., that a young lady who is dejected over a great grief may learn how Christ comforts those who trust in him and may regain her wonted cheerfulness. — Y. E. H., Liberty, Mo., whose misconduct caused his wife and daughter to leave him, asks prayer that God would show them how sincerely he has repented, and lead them to forgive him as God has forgiven him and that they may return to the home they left a year ago. — W. H. B., Piedmont, Wyo., that God would interpose to save a child from evil companions and would prevent her falling into grievous sin. — Parents, Boston, Mass., that their son, an Evangelical minister, may be kept from worldliness, and that his wife may cease to be the cause of his inconsistencies.

Many other requests were received and were presented at the prayer meeting, which we have not space to publish.

A Prominent Physician Writes.

SPOTSWOOD, N. J., Aug. 3, 1896.
Messrs. McKesson & Robbins:
Dear Sirs:—Please send me, by mail, four more bottles of Tartaric Tablets (10c each).
I will also here state, in justice, that this is the most welcome remedy that has come into my hands since my beginning of the practice of medicine. It has given me, in every case of rheumatism in which I have used it, the happiest kind of results. I have used discretion, perhaps even more than necessary, in its employment; that it be given to patients whom I believed required such a remedy or preparation; but these are just the kind that refuse to yield to ordinary treatment, old chronic cases of gouty diathesis, where there is a tendency to calcareous deposits, etc. These are undoubtedly, or have been, at least to me, the most troublesome patients in my practice to give what might fairly be termed good results. Now these have been the very kind in which I have been using Tartaric Tablets with the very happiest results to patients and myself. Many valuable remedies come daily to our aid, but this has been the most welcome one to me thus far.
Yours very truly,

SAPOLIO

By REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

Diaz—The Apostle of Cuba.

ONE of the most heroic personalities that has come to the front in connection with the Cuban insurrection against Spain, is Diaz, the devoted Baptist minister, who by his unflagging energy, marvelous self-sacrifice and splendor as a preacher, has gathered about him in the city of Havana a church nearly twenty-five hundred members, and a congregation of eight thousand souls. Six years ago, in Clarendon street Baptist Church, Boston, he told a very interesting story of his conversion and the development of his work as a minister.

When he was converted he immediately commenced his labors in his own family. They were astonished and troubled to hear him talking of Christ, the Bible, and salvation, and were greatly opposed to it, his father refusing to listen to him. Every member of the family was against him, with the exception of a little four-year-old sister who, after hearing of Christ, said: "I like that man, and will love him." His father was a Catholic, and very bitter against what he said. She called him a heretic, a heretic, a Jew. "She said 'I will not speak to you if you do not come back to the church and the religion I taught you.' He tried to tell her about Christ and his word, but she would not listen to him: all she would say was: 'If you are my son and love me, you will leave that religion and come back to the Catholic Church.' She knew very well that he loved her, and what she said troubled him very much. They lived in the same house for months without her speaking to him. He trusted in the Lord, however, and prayed constantly for her conversion. At the end of that time he was very much surprised to see her come in one evening and take a seat in the meeting. Her presence disturbed him, as he thought she had come to reprove him before the people. In mastering his feelings, he preached his usual sermon and then gave the invitation to those who wished to become members to stand up. His mother was one of the four who arose. Now he thought she was going to speak to him. Three of the people stood on his right side, and his mother was on the left side. Not knowing what she was going to do, he turned back to her and began to examine her over three, thinking she would think better of what she was about to do, and go away. She was intensely engaged with the other persons whom he was examining, when one of the people said:

"Well, mother, what are you doing here?"

"Mr. Diaz, there is your mother standing over there; why don't you speak to her?"

Turning to her, he said:

"Alberto," said she, "don't you want me in your church?"

"Yes, mother, we want you if you are ready to receive the Lord Jesus Christ:

but how is it that you have changed?" he asked in great surprise.

"Through the Lord Jesus Christ, whom I have found in your Bible," she answered.

Then she stood up and told the people of the trouble they had had, how she had not spoken to her son for so long a time, but when she had read her Bible and found the way to salvation she could no longer resist coming and joining them.

Diaz says: "When my mother was in my own hands and I was about to immerse her, all the words that my tongue would give utterance to were, 'Lord Jesus, this is my mother: have mercy.'"

After his mother came to the light, his greatest anxiety was for the conversion of his father. He was a man of science who, immersed in his scientific studies, thought, like many others, that religion was something good enough for women and children, but nothing for a man to have anything to do with. The son approached him one day with the Bible and said:

"Father, don't you want to read this book?"

"No," said he, "that book is too old. I want something new."

One day, talking with his mother about it, she asked:

"Do you think, Alberto, that if father reads the Bible he will be converted?"

"Yes," said the young preacher: "if we can only get him to read the Bible he will soon be converted."

"Then I will make him read the Bible," she exclaimed.

So in about three or four days, when Sunday came, she went to him, putting on her gloves, and making him believe she was in a great hurry, said:

"Father, won't you please read those three or four verses for me? I am in a great hurry, and I want to know my lesson before I go to Sunday School."

The old scientist was very devoted to his wife, and so he took her Bible and read the verses she had pointed out to him. Under various pretenses she kept him reading the Bible for her. Early one morning, a little while later, young Diaz awoke, and seeing a light in the next room, thought some one was sick, and going to see what was the matter, he was so surprised at what he saw that he could not speak. There sat his father, reading the Bible at four o'clock in the morning. He said to him:

"Father, what have you been doing here?"

"Oh, I have been reading this book," he answered: "what time is it?"

"Four o'clock," the young man answered.

"Four o'clock! No!" he said, "it cannot be more than eleven."

But the surprised and delighted son told him it was really four o'clock, and asked how he liked the book.

"I like this book," said the old man, "and will go with you next Sunday."

He went to the church on the following Sunday, was happily converted to Christ, and entered upon a joyous Christian life.

Free.—A Wonderful Shrub.—Cures Kidney and Bladder Diseases, Rheumatism, etc.

New evidence shows that Alkavis, the new botanical product of the Kava-Kava Shrub, is indeed a true specific cure for diseases caused by Uric acid in the blood, or by disorders of the Kidneys and urinary organs. A remarkable case is that of Rev. A. C. Darling, of North Constantia, N. Y., as told in the New York Herald of recent date. He was cured by Alkavis, after, as he says himself, he had lost faith in man and medicine, and was preparing to die. Similar testimony of extraordinary cures of Kidney and bladder diseases of long standing, comes from many other sufferers, and 1200 hospital cures have been recorded in 30 days. Up to this time the Church Kidney Cure Co., No. 418 Fourth Avenue, New York, are the only importers of Alkavis, and they are so anxious to prove its value that for the sake of introduction they will send a free treatment of Alkavis prepaid by mail to every reader of The Christian Herald who is a sufferer from any form of Kidney or Bladder disorder, Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Gravel, Pain in Back, Female Complaints, or other affliction due to improper action of the Kidneys or Urinary Organs. We advise all sufferers to send their names and address to the company, and receive the Alkavis free. To prove its wonderful curative powers, it is sent to you entirely free.

A Ringing Endorsement from Rev. Geo. C. Needham The Anglo-American Evangelist.

EAST NORTHFIELD, Mass., Feb. 1st, 1897.
Mr. J. E. Du Bois,

MY DEAR SIR:—I have invariably declined giving endorsement to medicines or agencies for curative purposes. But after a faithful use of the Electropoise in my family I have had such signal proof of its remedial value that I herein voluntarily testify to its healing virtues. It is my immediate duty to make known its curative properties for the sake of those that suffer. The Electropoise has very materially benefitted myself in dissipating the agonies of chronic nervous dyspepsia. I regret that an unjust prejudice founded on misrepresentation kept me from its beneficent help until recently.

Yours, GEO. C. NEEDHAM.

Mr. J. E. Du Bois,

DEAR SIR:—I fully endorse my husband's testimony to the value of the Electropoise, both in family and personal use. Yours, ELIZABETH A. NEEDHAM.
Rev. Geo. C. Needham is the Anglo-American Evangelist and author of books for Bible study. Mrs. Needham is also widely known as a Bible teacher and theological writer of inter-national reputation.

A SUPERB REFERENCE LIBRARY

covering the entire range of human knowledge, invention and discovery up to the present day, including the Arts, Sciences, History, Biography, Philosophy, Astronomy, Meteorology, Geography, Navigation, Geology, Exploration, Botany, Agriculture, Commerce, Finance, Zoology, Ethnology, Physiology, Chemistry, Electricity, Law, Medicine, Theology, Statistics, etc.

JUST OFF THE PRESS!

The new American Standard Encyclopedia is brought right down to the date of its issue, and contains hundreds of articles on subjects on which all the older reference works are necessarily silent. It is also a superior Pronouncing Dictionary, giving all words in general use, carefully defined. Its contents embody a Biographical Dictionary, a Gazetteer of the World, a Glossary of Technical Terms, late Census Reports, an Atlas of the whole globe and a rich storehouse of general, practical, up-to-date information—scientific, historical, military, social and civil—all arranged and classified in convenient form for ready reference.

UNTIL April 30 ONE DOLLAR

IT IS THE VERY LATEST OF ALL REFERENCE WORKS. These are some of the live topics that are treated with 1896 accuracy and freshness, viz: Argon, X-rays, Atlanta Exposition, Li Hung Chang, Nansen's Arctic Explorations, Horseless Carriage, Air Ships, Color Photography, Free Silver, Electrical Science, Acetylene, Prof. Roentgen, Skidography, etc. On these and a thousand other important topics of to-day the older books say nothing or are years behind the age. This great new work is an absolute necessity to all who want to keep abreast of the times.

IT IS MAGNIFICENTLY ILLUSTRATED THROUGHOUT with beautiful colored maps of every country on the globe, superb charts bearing upon anatomy, mineralogy, entomology, zoology, fossils, electrical science, ordnance, etc., besides the countless wood-cut engravings that graphically illustrate the thousands of subjects.

OUR GREAT SPECIAL OFFER FOR INTRODUCTION

As a means of quickly introducing and popularizing this peerless home reference library, we have decided to distribute a few advance sets in each community, regardless of cost and purely as an advertising project. We know that every set so placed will prove an advertisement of the greatest power, and lead to hundreds of sales at paying prices. Comparison with any and all other reference works will quickly demonstrate the immeasurable superiority of our grand new work. On April 30 prices will be advanced to regular rates—$10.00 to $11.00 a set. We reserve the right to withdraw this offer at any time without notice, in which case money will be refunded without cost to sender.

HOW TO ORDER:

Send $1.00 to American Newspaper Syndicate (address below) and the entire set will be forwarded. Subsequent payments to be made as follows: On cloth style, $1.00 a month for 6 months; on Half-Russia style, $1.00 a month for 8 months. When ordering be sure to state style of binding wanted, (we recommend the Half-Russia with full shipping directions. All transportation charges to be paid by purchaser. Books guaranteed unsold or first payment refunded if set is returned within ten days. We refer to any newspaper or bank in Philadelphia.

SPECIAL TO CASH BUYERS: If cash in full be sent with order, prices will be $5.00 for cloth style, $7.00 for Half Russia, until April 30 only. Book of Specimen Pages mailed free upon request.

CAUTION! We are the sole publishers of the new American Standard Encyclopedia. Beware of inferior imitations advertised at higher prices. See that our name, and no other, is at the bottom of each title page.

Questions and Answers.

THE MAIL-BAG is this week honored with an official communication from the Chief of the Weather Bureau which, as it will be found interesting to all our readers, we give in full:

U. S. Dept. of Agriculture, Weather Bureau, WASHINGTON, D. C., February 17, 1897.

The Christian Herald. In reply to the question submitted to you by William Dixon, 108 Scollard street, Toronto, Can., asking on what part of the globe New Year's day first commences, I beg to reply that, by common consent of European nations, the dates of our civil days begin at midnight on the 18th meridian, opposite to that of Greenwich, which passes through Eastern Siberia and the Pacific Ocean. When vessels cross this meridian they necessarily change the date. It is understood that on some of the islands, the 18th meridian is not strictly adhered to, depending in part upon their convenience in commercial transactions with neighboring islands, and in part upon ancient customs, before the adoption of the 18th meridian. Strictly speaking, New Year's day begins simultaneously at all points on the 18th meridian at midnight, but for convenience, as just mentioned, such localities as Chatham Island (West longitude 176), the Samoan Islands (W. 170), and the Russian stations in Siberia (East Cape, 170 W.), anticipate so as to have the same date with Europe and Asia; the Aleutian Islands west of the 18th meridian use the Russian date which is old style reckoning, or twelve days later than the European; the islands east of the 18th meridian use new style and the American dates in business transactions, but old style and Russian dates in the Russian Church ceremonies; formerly the whole of Alaska kept the same date as Russia, at that time, therefore, the Russian New Year's day began first at the southern end of Alaska and spread westward over Siberia and Russia.

These customs as to dates are liable to change at any time, but, to the best of my belief, at present New Year's day, and, of course, every other day, first begins at Chatham Island and the Samoan Islands and advances thence westward around the globe. WILLIS L. MOORE, Chief of Bureau.

Chief Moore has the thanks of our readers for elucidating this very intricate and puzzling problem.

N. M. W. McKenzie, Tenn. 1. Is it right for one who believes in divine healing and has had prayer offered for him, to use a well-recommended remedy? 2. Is ——— a reliable remedy?

1. We suppose he would be censured for taking medicine by the teachers of divine healing, if he had ventured himself by faith on the divine power. But he might quote Ezekiel's example as a precedent. Ezekiel was assured that God would heal him (Ez. Kings 20: 5), but the promise did not keep him from applying the poultice of figs which Isaiah recommended. 2. We know nothing of the remedy you mention. Better ask a doctor.

Earnest Student, Waukon, Ia. Should you think the wrong-doing of the Prodigal Son (Luke 15: 11-32) included such sins as those mentioned in Proverbs 7? If so, could they have been so easily forgiven?

We think that so good a father as he whom Christ described, would have forgiven his son when he came back penitent, even if he had been guilty of those sins. God will forgive them when the sinner repents and renounces them and pleads for pardon through Christ. That they are so often fatal is due to the fact that they have a benumbing influence and the victim has seldom an inclination to return. If he did return and honestly seek pardon, he would be greeted with the words Christ used to such a sinner: "Neither do I condemn thee; go and sin no more."

Troubled Husband, Middletown, N. Y. What ought a man to do whose wife tells him that all her love is given to another man, and that only her marriage vow holds her faithful? Ought he to set her free by a divorce, so that she might marry the man she loves, if he is willing to get a divorce also, and marry her?

We think the course suggested the very worst he can take. It involves the breaking up of another home. We would earnestly advise him to set himself strenuously to work to win his wife's love. It may be a long and difficult undertaking under the circumstances, but we believe it may be done and it is worth doing. In the year to come, if he succeeds, as he is sure to do if he gives his mind to it, she will thank him with all her heart for having saved her from herself. The husband has many advantages in his favor, and if he woos his wife with the patience and persistence and untiring affection that he would employ as a lover, he will win her. It is probably only a transient fancy on her part, of which in her heart she is ashamed. There are few women who can resist the earnest, patient, devoted effort of a man to win their love, and when the effort is made by a husband who has so many opportunities of showing her kindness and affection, it must succeed. It is worth the doing for her sake as well as his own. We know of a similar case in which the success has been very marked.

Inquirer, Salem, Ore. 1. When Job's wife advised him to curse God and die, did she mean that death would be the punishment of cursing God? 2. What are the best means of eradicating scepticism from the heart?

1. She was impatient with her husband's submissive spirit. She had the spirit that Satan falsely imputed to Job—the spirit of serving God just so long as and no longer than it paid to do so. The Revised Version translates the words, "Renounce God," which convey the meaning more clearly. It is that he is foolish to trust in a God who does not protect him, and he had better abandon his trust even if death followed. 2. Prayer and some active Christian work. You will find your doubts threatened against the ungodly? Or is it to be delivered from the power of sin? Or is it that you want to live a pure, useful, helpful life? Whatever your motive may be, your first step is to take your friend's advice: Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ. Ask him to take charge of your life and earnestly seek, looking to him continually for help, to lead a sinless life and one of helpfulness to all around you. It may be in your case, as it often is in those piously reared, that the change may be gradual, but it is not the less real.

J. B. F., River Junction, Fla. Who taught the first school in America and at what place?

This cannot be definitely answered. The earliest public schools were established by the citizens of towns. They were opened in Rhode Island in 1638, Massachusetts and Connecticut, notably in Boston, Dorchester, Salem, Hartford and New Haven about 1640-42. Among the earliest teachers were Thomas Hooker (at New Haven), Joshua Atwater and William Davis. Virginia had schools as early as 1618. New Amsterdam's first school was opened in 1633. There were doubtless many schools opened earlier, however, of which no record has been preserved.

Jas. R., Dayton, O. What proportion of the fun contributed through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for Armenia, India, and similar causes, is consumed in expenses?

None whatever. Every dollar contributed through this paper reaches its ultimate destination in full. All expenses in connection with the various charities, such as cablegram transportation, correspondence and even personal services of messengers and others, borne by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which undertakes, absolutely without charge, to ward such moneys to the beneficiaries.

Subscriber, Amboy, O., writes:

In the editorial column of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of February 10 is a short piece of mercy for convicts. I would like to say that I testify to the truth of what the editor says, know by actual experience, but I believe that a man is released from prison, if he will show his actions and manners of life that he desires live an honest and upright life, he will find people will meet him half-way, and he will find more friends as time goes on. When I came out of prison it seemed to me that everybody was doing all they could to send me back again. I was slighted and snubbed and insulted in different ways, but after awhile there came a change. Some of my worst enemies became my best friends, not only live a honest life, but a Christian life; and now till one of the highest offices in our church.

B. F. S., Kingwood, Pa. Please give the story "The Wandering Jew."

It is a tradition which is found in several countries, and it has many variants. According to the early Christian writer, Mathias Parisius (who had the story from an Armenian bishop), the Jew was Cartaphilus, aged the doorkeeper of Pilate's palace. He was mocked at Jesus as he was being dragged out of the palace, and he tauntingly, "Go on! go faster! My dost thou linger?" Jesus turned and rebuked him, saying, "I am going, but thou shalt remain waiting till I return. Cartaphilus, the legend says, afterward became a Christian, and was baptized. Whenever he reaches his hundredth year he swoons, and on recovery, finds himself at the same age at which the Lord pronounced his punishment. Another version gives his name as Ahasuerus, a shoemaker of Jerusalem, and declares that he has appeared repeatedly in different European cities. This version affirms that the man struck the Saviour while he later leaned against his porch to rest. This fanciful tradition has become the theme of many writers, and the subject of poem, epic, drama and novel.

R. M. C., Viola Centre, Ia. Where did the custom begin of giving the title D.D. to ministers of the Gospel?

The title "Doctor" was used very early period as indicating a teacher of Christian doctrine. "Doctor of the Church" was the title applied to Athanasius, Basil, Chrysostom, Jerome, Augustine, and also to Gregory the Great. In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries many learned churchmen were thus termed. The academic degree of "Doctor" originated in the University of Paris followed that of the University of England in 1207. In England and the United States it is conferred as D.D. (Doctor Divinitatis); in certain other lands the older form of title, D. T. (Doctor Theologiae) is retained. In English-speaking countries it is now very often conferred as an honorary degree without examination upon men who have distinguished themselves as teachers of Christianity by voice or pen, but in a few theological universities the academic degree is still given upon examination to students of proper standing.

"Young Wife." I am anxious to become a Christian, but am confused by the answers I receive. One friend tells me I must live a sinless life, and I know that is impossible for me. Another says, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved," but I have believed on him from childhood, having been piously reared, yet I know I am not a Christian. What ought I to do?

Why do you wish to become a Christian? It is a life of self-denial and cross-bearing. Perhaps if you ask yourself honestly and seriously what your object is in wishing to become a Christian, you may get some light on your problem. You say you have believed on Christ from your childhood, but there are many ways of believing, and you may have confused them. A belief in the mere fact of Christ having lived, as described in the Gospel, is not the kind of belief prescribed in your friend's Scriptural answer. If you were in a burning house and someone told you to sit still and he would come and save you, and while you waited—the flames coming nearer and nearer—another person came and urged you to jump from the window as your only chance of escaping being burned to death, could you sit still, depending on your friend keeping his promise to save you? That would depend on whether you believed in your friend. Now return to the first question, Why do you wish to be a Christian? Is it to escape the punishment

Expositors of prophecy believe that human wickedness will culminate in the last days of this dispensation in the elevation to supreme power of some crafty potentate who will persecute Christ's people and will be an incarnation of the evil one. This monster of iniquity will be destroyed at Christ's coming (See II. Thess. 2: 8).

OUR HISTORIC WHITE HOUSE.

Washington's Brilliant Social Life—The Inauguration Festivities and the Winter Round of Receptions—"The Mistress of the White House."

INAUGURATION Day is always a red-letter occasion at the National Capitol. Washington is never so crowded as during the first week in March in those years that usher in a new administration. A society, which has been all a-flutter for a month or more, is then prepared to pour out its gayest moods to do honor to the new Executive and the lady who, for the first time, is to be known as the Mistress of the White House. The preparations for the inauguration of President-elect McKinley have been completed, and the incoming administration will be inaugurated into office with the same imposing ceremonies that have attended every inauguration in the past. This year the inauguration programme will be substantially as follows: the President-elect and Vice-President-elect are escorted to the State Chamber about 10 A. M., where the oath of office is administered and the inaugural address is delivered. The President then proceeds to the White House. At a quarter of one hour he is escorted to review the great parade under the command of General Porter. After the military part of the programme has been carried out, the great Washington world—Cabinet Officers, Senators, and Representatives, the diplomats and the leaders in army and naval circles, together with their wives and daughters, a host of other people—will unite as usual at every inauguration in a general celebration of the day, one of the leading events being the brilliant evening assembly and reception at the White House.

The social functions of the White House are clearly defined by long usage. Aside from the New Year's reception, when the doors of the Executive Mansion are thrown open to the public, the President gives each winter three evening card receptions, one evening public reception, and three state dinners. The first state dinner each year is given to the Cabinet, the second to the Diplomatic Corps, and the third to the United States Supreme Court. The first card reception is given in honor of the Diplomatic Corps, the second in honor of Congress and the judiciary, and the third to meet the officers of the Army and Navy and the Marine Corps. The invitations for the evening receptions are issued to prominent citizens, and personal friends of the President. Only one card is issued for the three receptions. These invitation cards are manufactured especially for the White House, and bear in gilt the "E. Pluribus Unum" of the United States. The form of the invitation varies but little year after year.

Elaborate preparations are made for these receptions. The historic White House is always appropriately decorated with a profusion of plants and flowers. The Blue Room, where the receiving party stand, presents a picturesque appearance. The doors and windows are draped with garlands of smilax. In the recesses of the three deep windows are grouped tall, arching palms, among which cluster scarlet flowers. The mantels are banked with white and scarlet blossoms. The circular divan which has occupied the centre of this room for so many years, is frequently adorned with a tall

Though these White House receptions more nearly approach the court drawing-rooms of European countries, they are American to the core, and despite the effort to make them dignified affairs they are not without phases that verge on the humorous. It has been understood that the rush could be avoided by coming early; but as now the many aim to be early, they crowd the inner corridor long before the appointed time. About fifty policemen are detailed for duty at the White House and grounds. Officers or detectives in citizen's clothes are stationed in the conservatory and other parts of the building. The Marine Band, in bright red uniforms, occupy seats in the entrance corridor on all state occasions. Promptly at nine o'clock the band begins, and the President and his wife come down the private stairway and pass into the Blue Room followed by the Vice-President and wife, and the Cabinet Officers and their ladies. The President stands at the head of the line, his wife at his right hand. The wife of the Vice-President and the ladies of the Cabinet in the order of their husbands' official position.

From nine o'clock until twelve on the evening of the reception, the White House grounds present an animated scene, as shown in the illustration on the first page of this issue. The guests arriving in carriages drive through the eastern gate of the grounds. Frequently, on these occasions, there is a crush of carriages, and the line extends from the gate to Pennsylvania Avenue. Indeed, it is sometimes so dense that considerable time is consumed in different directions converge near the door of the Red Room, which renders the crowd here something rather formidable.

MRS. MCKINLEY.
THE NEW MISTRESS OF THE WHITE HOUSE.

As guests enter, they form in a single line for presentation to the President and the ladies of the receiving party.

At the entrance of the Blue Room, the name of each guest is given to the official who makes the presentation to the President who then repeats the name as he takes the hand of the guest. The President's wife also shakes hands with each, as she also repeats the name, or if this repetition be fatiguing she kindly bows a welcome to all. The other ladies of the receiving party may shake hands part of the evening and stop when they become tired. Behind the receiving party in the Blue Room are congregated a number of ladies specially invited to assist in entertaining, and usually the Cabinet Officers are there also during the hours of reception.

Not only is the White House inadequate to accommodate the guests who throng it each winter, but as an executive residence it is unsatisfactory. The family really live in the second story, and which they can only occupy a little over half, as the other half is almost wholly devoted to public officers. The President's household has about nine living rooms upstairs. The largest and most pleasant of these is the library, a beautiful oval room, which serves as the family sitting-room. The room next to this, which was formally a bedroom, is used as a play-room for the little Cleveland children. In recent winters it has been converted into a school-room and furnished with tiny seats. Besides Ruth and Esther Cleveland, eight or ten little children attended this school, including President Garfield's little granddaughter. They were taught by a young lady from New York city. To make more room for the family of the President the upper corridor is partitioned off with curtains and furnished tastefully as a reception room or sitting-room.

Our photographs, procured expressly for this article, will be found especially interesting at the present inauguration season. All the rooms have a historic interest, perhaps none more so than the quaint old fashioned kitchen shown in one of the illustrations.

THE "EAST ROOM" — THE LARGEST ROOM IN THE WHITE HOUSE.

bouquet of fine white camellias and hyacinth blossoms, forming a most attractive picture. Above this the crystal chandelier sparkles through a veil of flowers and garlands of smilax. The Red Room and Green Room are fragrant with the perfume of many plants whose varied colors contrast well with the green of the palms that fill the corners.

The great East Room, the largest of the state parlors, is decorated in harmony with its majestic proportions. Before the triple window are towering palms reaching to the ceiling, while about their base are grouped smaller plants and foliage plants. The mantels are banked with scarlet and white flowers. Brilliant electric lightings add to the general effectiveness of the scene. The guests usually appear in full evening dress, the ladies wearing elegant evening toilets.

At all the diplomatic receptions, the members of the Diplomatic Corps appear in the court-dress of their respective countries, and at the Army and Navy reception the officers appear in full uniform. The New Year's receptions are especially brilliant, as both the Diplomatic Corps and the Army and Navy officers all appear in their distinct paraphernalia.

driving this short distance: you may have to wait half an hour before you can enter the gate, where two or three policemen stand. From here the line of carriages proceed slowly through the circular driveway and at last arrive at the porte-cochere. Here there are more policemen and a footman who opens the carriage door. The walking contingent, especially if the weather be pleasant, is always large, and the portico is crowded with people who are endeavoring to make their way to the door. The concourse of people here is so dense that progress is slow, but finally you are able to press through the door, which is guarded by policemen and White House employees, and join the throng within the corridor, that is even more compact than that outside. The next feat is to attain the cloak-room. The gentlemen's coats are checked in a room west of the corridor, and the state dining-room on these occasions is converted into a dressing-room for ladies, and provided with a dressing-case, looking-glasses, etc. When wraps are disposed of the guests proceed to the Red Room—the goal all are striving for. WINGS OF SERAPHIM.

A Sermon by

Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., { With twain he covered his face, and with on the Text: Isaiah 6: 2 : . . . } twain he covered his feet, and with twain he did fly.

In a hospital of leprosy good King Uzziah had died, and the whole land was shadowed with solemnity, and theological and prophetic Isaiah was thinking about religious things, as one is apt to do in time of great national bereavement, and forgetting the presence of his wife and two sons, who made up his family, he has a dream, not like the dreams of ordinary character, which generally come from indigestion, but a vision most instructive, and under the touch of the hand of the Almighty.

The place, the ancient Temple: building grand, awful, majestic. Within that Temple a throne higher and grander than that occupied by any czar or sultan or emperor. On that throne, the eternal Christ. In lines surrounding that throne, the brightest celestials, not the cherubim, but higher than they, the most exquisite and radiant of the heavenly inhabitants: the seraphim. They are called burners because they look like fire. Lips of fire, eyes of fire, feet of fire. In addition to the features and the limbs which suggest a human being, there are pinions which suggest the lightest, the swiftest, the most buoyant and the most aspiring of all unintelligent creation—a bird. Each seraph had six wings, each two of the wings for a different purpose. Isaiah's dream quivers and flashes with these pinions. Now folded, now spread, now beaten in locomotion. "With twain he covered his feet, with twain he covered his face, and with twain he did fly."

The probability is that these wings were not all used at once. The seraph standing there near the throne overwhelmed at the insignificance of the paths his feet had trodden as compared with the paths trodden by the feet of God, and with the lameness of his locomotion amounting almost to decrepitude as compared with the divine velocity, with feathery veil of angelic modesty hides the feet. "With twain he did cover the feet."

Standing there overpowered by the overmatching splendors of God's glory, and unable longer with the eyes to look upon them, and wishing those eyes shaded from the insufferable glory, the pinions gather over the countenance. "With twain he did cover the face." Then as God tells this seraph to go to the farthest outpost of immensity on message of light and love and joy, and get back before the first autumn, it does not take the seraph a great while to spread himself upon the air with unimagined celerity, one stroke of the wing equal to ten thousand leagues of air. "With twain he did fly."

The most practical and useful lesson for you and me when we see the seraph spreading his wings over the feet, is the lesson of humility at imperfection. The highest angels of God are so far beneath God that he chides them with folly. The seraph so far beneath God, and we so far beneath the seraph in service we ought to be placed in our lives, utter and complete. Our feet how laggard they have been in the divine service. Our feet, how many mistakes they have taken. Our feet, how many paths of worldliness, and how they have walked

Neither God nor seraph intended to put any dishonor upon that which is one of the masterpieces of Almighty God—the human foot. Physiologist and anatomist are overwhelmed at the wonders of its organization. The Bridgewater Treatise, written by Sir Charles Bell, on the wisdom and goodness of God as illustrated in the human hand, was a result of the $40,000 bequeathed in the last will and testament of the Earl of Bridgewater for the encouragement of Christian literature. The world could afford to forgive his eccentricities, though he had two dogs seated at his table, and though he put six dogs alone in an equipage drawn by four horses and attended by two footmen. With his large bequest inducing Sir Charles Bell to write so valuable a book on the wisdom of God in the structure of the human hand, the world could afford to forgive his oddities. And the world could now afford to have another Earl of Bridgewater, however idiosyncratic, if he would induce some other Sir Charles Bell to write a book on the wisdom and goodness of God in the construction of the human foot. The articulation of its bones, the lubrication of its joints, the gracefulness of its lines, the ingenuity of its cartilages, the delicacy of its veins, the rapidity of its muscular contraction, the sensitiveness of its nerves.

I sound the praises of the human foot. With that we halt or climb or march. It is the foundation of the physical fabric. It is the base of a God-poised column. With it the warrior braces himself for battle. With it the orator plants himself for eulogium. With it the toiler reaches his work. With it the outraged stamps his indignation. Its loss an irreparable disaster. Its health an invaluable equipment. If you want to know its value, ask the man whose foot paralysis hath shriveled, or machinery hath crushed, or surgeon's knife hath amputated. The Bible honors it. Especial care: "Lest thou dash thy foot against a stone;" "he will not suffer thy foot to be moved;" "thy feet shall not stumble." Especial charge: "Keep thy foot when thou goest to the house of God." Especial peril: "Their feet shall slide in due time." Connected with the world's dissolution: "He shall set one foot on the sea and the other on the earth."

Give me the history of your foot, and I will give you the history of your lifetime. Tell me up what steps it hath gone, down what declivities, and in what roads and in what directions, and I will know more about you than I want to know. None of us could endure the scrutiny. Our feet not always in paths of God. Sometimes in paths of worldliness. Our feet, a divine and glorious machinery for usefulness and work, so often making missteps, so often going in the wrong direction. God knowing every step, the patriarch saying, "Thou testest a print on the heels of my feet." Crimes of the hand, crimes of the tongue, crimes of the eye, crimes of the ear not worse than crimes of the foot. Oh, we want the wings of humility to cover the feet. Ought we not to go into self-abnegation before the all-searching, all-scrutinizing, all-trying eye of God? The seraphs do. How much more we? "With twain he covered the feet."

All this talk about the dignity of human nature is braggadocio and sin. Our nature started at the hand of God regal, but it has been pauperized. There is a well in Belgium which once had very pure water, and it was stoutly masoned with stone and brick; but that well afterward became the centre of the battle of Waterloo. At the opening of the battle the soldiers with their sabres compelled the gardener, William Von Kysom, to draw water out of the well for them, and it was very pure water. But the battle raged, and three hundred dead and half dead were flung into the well for quick and easy burial; so that the well of refreshment became the well of death, and long after, people looked down into the well and they saw the bleached skulls but no water. So the human soul was a well of good, but the armies of sin have fought around it, and fought across it and been slain, and it has become a well of skeletons. Dead hopes, dead resolutions, dead opportunities, dead ambitions. An abandoned well unless Christ shall reopen and purify and till it as the well of Belgium never was. Unclean, unclean.

Another seraphic posture in the text: "With twain he covered the face." That means reverence Godward. Never so much irreverence abroad in the world as to-day. You see it in the defaced statuary, in the cutting out of figures from fine paintings, in the chipping of monuments for a memento, in the fact that military guard must stand at the grave of Lincoln and Garfield, and that old shade trees must be cut down for firewood, though fifty George P. Morris' beg the woodmen to spare the tree, and that calls a corpse a cadaver, and that speaks of death as going over to the majority, and substitutes for the reverent terms father and mother, "the old man" and "the old woman," and finds nothing impressive in the ruins of Baalbec or the columns of Karnac, and sees no difference in the Sabbath from other days except it allows more dissipation, and reads the Bible in what is called higher criticism, making it not the Word of God but a good book with some fine things in it. Irreverence never so much abroad. How many take the name of God in vain, how many trivial things said about the Almighty. Not willing to have God in the world, they roll up an idea of sentimentality and humanitarianism and impudence and imbecility, and call it God. No wings of reverence over the face, no taking off of shoes on holy ground. You can tell from the way they talk they could have made a better world than this, and that the God of the Bible shocks every sense of propriety. They talk of the love of God in a way that shows you they believe it does not make any difference how bad a man is here, he will come in at the shining gate. They talk of the love of God in a way which shows you they think it is a general jail delivery for all the abandoned and the scoundrelly of the universe. No punishment hereafter for any wrong done here.

The Bible gives two descriptions of God, and they are just opposite, and they are both true. In one place the Bible says God is love. In another place the Bible says God is a consuming fire. The explanation is plain as plain can be. God through Christ is love. God out of Christ is fire. To win the one and to escape the other we have only to throw ourselves body, mind and soul into Christ's keeping. "No," says Irreverence. "I want no atonement, I want no pardon, I want no intervention; I will go up and face God, and I will challenge him, and I will defy him, and I will ask him what he wants to do with me." So the finite confronts the infinite, so a tack hammer tries to break a thunderbolt, so the breath of human nostrils defies the everlasting God, while the hierarchs of heaven bow the head and bend the knee as the King's chariot goes by, and the archangel turns away because he cannot endure the splendor, and the chorus of all the empires of heaven comes in with full diapason, "Holy, holy, holy. Reverence for sham, reverence for old merely because it is old, reverence stupidity however learned, reverence incapacity however finely inaugurated have none. But we want more reverence for God, more reverence for the sacraments, more reverence for the Bible, more reverence for the pure, more reverence for the good. Reverence a characteristic of all great natures. You hear it in the of the master oratorios. You see it in Raphaels and Titians and Ghirlandas. You study it in the architecture of Aholiabs and Christopher Wrens. Do not be flippant about God. Do not joke at death. Do not make fun of the Bible. Do not deride the Eternal. The brightest and mightiest seraph cannot look abashed upon him. Involuntarily wings come up. "With twain he covered his face."

Who is this God before whom the arrogant and intractable refuse reverence? There was an engineer by the name Strasicrates who was in the employ of Alexander the Great, and he offered to hew a mountain in the shape of his majesty the emperor, the enormous figure to in the left hand a city of ten thousand inhabitants, while with the right hand it to hold a basin large enough to collect the mountain torrents. Alexander applauded him for his ingenuity, but for the enterprise because of its costliness. Yet I have to tell you that our King is in one hand all the cities of the earth and all the oceans, while he has the stars heaven for his tiara.

Earthly power goes from hand to hand, from Henry I. to Henry II. and III., from Charles I. to Charles II., from Louis I. to Louis II. and Louis III., from everlasting to everlasting is God. God the first, God the last, God the only. He has one telescope with which he sees everything: His omniscience. He has one bridge with which he crosses everything: His omnipresence. He has one hammer with which he builds everything: His omnipotence. Put two tablespoons of water in the palm of your hand; it will overflow; but Isaiah indicates that God puts the Atlantic and the Pacific, the Arctic and the Antarctic and the Mediterranean and the Black Sea and all the waters of the earth in the hollow of his hand. The fingers the beach on one side, the wrist the beach on the other. He holdeth it in the hollow of his hand.

As you take a pinch of salt or pile between your thumb and two fingers, Isaiah indicates God takes up the world. He measures the dust of the earth to the original there indicating that God sees all the dust of all the continents between the thumb and two fingers. You raise around your hand a blue ribbon five or ten times. You say it is five hand-breads or it is ten hand-breads. So indicate the prophet God winds the blue ribbon of the sky around his hand. "He meted out the heavens with a span." You see that balances are made of a beam suspended in the middle with two basins at the extremity of equal heft. In that what vast heft has been weighed. What are all the balances of earthly measurement compared with the balanced scales Isaiah saw suspended when he saw putting into the scales the Alps and the Appenines and Mount Washington and the Sierra Nevadas. You see the world had to be ballasted. It would not have too much weight in Europe, too much weight in Asia, or too much weight in Africa, or in America; so when God made the mountains he weighed them. The Bible distinctly says so. God weighs the weight of the great ranges that the continents, the tons, the pounds, the dupois, the ounces, the grains, the grammes—just how much they weigh, then, and just how much they weigh. "He weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance." Oh, what a God to run against, oh, what a God to dishonor, oh, what to defy! The brightest, the mightiest angel takes no familiarity with God. The wings of reverence are lifted. "With twain he covered the face."

another seraphic posture in the text.
The seraph must not always stand still. He must move, and it must be without clumbiness. There must be celerity and beauty in the movement. "With twain he did fly." Correction, exhilaration. Correction of our slow gait, for we only crawl in the service when we ought to fly at the divine bidding. Exhilaration in the fact that the angel has wings as the seraphs have wings.
What is a wing? An instrument of locomotion. They may not be like seraph's wings, they may not be like bird's wing, but the soul has wings. Aye! I have it now. Caged within bars of bone and flesh, but one day to be free. I hear the rustle of pinions in Sea-gull's poem which we sometimes sing:
Rise, my soul, and stretch thy wings.
I hear the rustle of pinions in Alexander
Pope's stanza, where he says:
I mount, I fly,
O Death where is thy victory?
A dying Christian not long ago cried out, "Wings, wings, wings!" The air is filled with them, coming and going, coming and going. You have seen how the dull, sluggish chrysalid becomes the bright butterfly;
the dull and the stupid and the lethargic transformed into the alert and the beautiful.
All my friends, in this world we are in the chrysalid state. Death will unfurl the wings. Oh, if we could only realize what a thing it will be to get rid of this encumbering clod of the body and mount the heavens, neither seagull nor lark nor alba-tron nor falcon, nor condor pitching from the highest range of Andes so buoyant or so majestic of stroke.
See that eagle in the mountain nest. It looks so sick, so ragged-feathered, so worn-out and so half asleep. Is that eagle dying? No. The ornithologist will tell you it is the moulting season with that bird. Not dying, but moulting. You see that Christian sick and weary and worn-out and seeming about to expire on what is called his death-bed. The world says he is dying. I say it is the moulting season for his soul—the body dropping away, the celestial pinions coming on.
Not dying, but moulting. Moulting out of weakness and sin and struggle into glory and into God. Why do you not shout?
Why do you sit shivering at the thought of death and trying to hold back and wishing you could stay here forever, and speak of departure as though the subject were filled with skeletons and the varnish of coffins, and as though you preferred
the foot to swift wing?
O people of God, let us stop playing the safe and prepare for rapturous flight.
When your soul stands on the verge of this life, and there are vast precipices beneath, and sapphired domes above, which will you fly? Will you swoop or will you soar? Will you fly downward or will you fly upward? Everything on the wing this day bidding us aspire. Holy Spirit on the wing. Angel of the New Covenant on the wing. Time on the wing, flying away from us. Eternity on the wing, flying toward us. Wings, wings, wings!
Live so near to Christ that when you are dead, people standing by your lifeless body will not soliloquize, saying: "What a disappointment life was to him; how averse he was to departure; what a pity that he had to die; what an awful calamity." Rather standing there may they see a sign more vivid on your still face than the vestiges of pain, something that will indicate that it was a happy exit and the clearance from oppressive quarantine, the cast-off chrysalid, the moulting of the faded and the useless, and the emergent from malarial valleys to bright, winning mountain tops, and be led to say, they stand there contemplating your military and your reverence in life, and your happiness in death: "With twain he covered the face, with twain he covered his face with twain he did fly." Wings!
Wings!

MR. McKINLEY'S HOME CHURCH.

The President-Elect an Earnest Member of The First M. E. Church of Canton, O.—The Story of a Progressive Western Pastorate.

It is fortunate for our Union, and augurs well for the permanency of its institutions and the upright administration of its affairs, that the men who have been at the helm of the ship of State have uniformly been men of high principle and deep convictions, and who have been more or less actively associated with the church and its work. Such a man is the REV. C. E. MANCHESTER.

incoming Executive, who for many years has been a member of the First M. E.
Church of his home town of Canton, O.

The First M. E. Church of Canton is a fine, massive stone structure and stands upon the corner of West Tuscarawas street and South Cleveland avenue, in the business part of the city, near the court house and city buildings. The structure was dedicated by Bishop Cyrus D. Foss, September 23d, 1883. At the time, Rev.

the honored Mother McKinley, now eighty-eight years of age, with other members of the family and friends.
During all the busy campaign, Mr. McKinley has been a regular attendant upon religious services on Sabbath mornings. Nor has he failed to bring his distinguished guests with him. Thousands of strangers have visited the church on week days, and relic hunters have carried away not only the pew numbers, but all the buttons from the cushions as well.

Mr. McKinley was Superintendent of the Sunday School early in the seventies, and has been,
and is now, a member of its Board of Trustees, to which position he was elected by the congregation.

There are three other M. E. Churches in the city, all growths from the mother church, which has a membership of 1,300 souls. The present pastor is Rev. C. E.
Manchester, D.D. He was born in Litchfield County, village of Colebrook River, Ct., September 30, 1844, and was therefore fifty-two years of age at his last birthday.
It is an interesting fact that Dr. Manchester gave three years of service in the 23d O. V. I., the same regiment which gave R. B. Hayes and William McKinley to the nation as presidents. Both President-elect and pastor enjoy the pleasantest relations, and an agreeable intimacy has existed between them many years.

Blessedness of Missionaries.

Suggestions on the Epworth League

—Topic for the Week Beginning

March 14, Isa. 52 : 7-10.

OF all men who at the close of life look back over their labors and pass judgment upon them, the missionary who has given his years to the task of telling some barbarous people the truths of Christianity seems the most alien to him in everything but common humanity, and to do this without the prospect of reward—what grander thing can any man do? It is true that men will do this for office, or for commerce, or for conquest, but with them there is a distinct object in view, for which they pay the INTERIOR OF FIRST M. E. CHURCH, CANTON, O.

price and receive the stipulated reward;
but with the missionary—his rewards go to others. The people whom he serves benefit by his labors, and he is content that it should be so. Like the candle that perishes in giving light, his life is consumed in his service. He braves dangers of climate, dangers of hostility, and dangers of travel that he may open blind eyes and point men to God. He goes to show them that their blind gropings after truth and the sacrifices and self-mortifica-tions by which they hope to propitiate the unknown God are useless and wrong; that their homage is due to One who loves them with an unutterable love, and to teach them to pray to Our Father who is in heaven. It is a glorious message to carry—one to thrill their hearts. How the career of the man who labors for money or for fame fades into sordid nothingness when compared with the joy of carrying such a message to those who have never heard it. The man who has had that joy may say with the first Christian missionary, whose labors and sufferings were manifold, "I have fought a good fight."

Why Christ is Precious.

Suggestions on the B. Y. P. U. Topic for March 14. Eph. 2: 1-10.

WHY is Christ precious? The question of the Topic needs a volume for its answer. The beginning of all life was inspired by him, and every step of progress along the path of Christian progress is in his strength. By his power we begin to live, and by his power we continue to this day. He called us to arise out of the mire of animalism, and he has walked beside us encouraging and helping us as we falteringly climbed the heights whose tops reach to the heavenly land. Looking at the lives of those who do not know him, realizing how like we are to them, yet how different we are, we may form some poor estimate of how precious he is who has made us different.
From him has come the new life which has transformed our lives; from him has come the power that has enabled us to overcome. Verily, great is the mystery of godliness. We cannot penetrate it, we cannot explain it, but we know. The stubborn fight with besetting sin which we waged without him was continuous defeat, but as we learned what inexhaustible treasures of strength he placed at our disposal and we began to draw upon them and taste the sweets of victory, we began to learn how precious he is. With every passing year, with every new attainment, we answer the question, Why is he precious? with the glad tribute that he is all in all. "Without me," Christ said, "Ye can do nothing," and we have found it so.
In union with him, the branch bears fruit, his life penetrates our being, and from him all that raises us above the animal derives its strength. His teaching and his example are our guides; we learn from them the way we should take, but they would be a mockery to our weakness without the power which enables us to tread the upward path, and this power we get from him. The life he lived in the flesh has made him acquainted with human frailty, so that to every one who grasps his hand by faith, he gives the help he needs.

THE FIRST M. E. CHURCH, CANTON, O.

D. C. Osborne, D.D., was pastor. The cost of the church property, not including the ground which it occupies, was $137,000 and it was dedicated free from debt. The seating capacity is about twelve hundred, and in it is a pew which has become historic. It is number ten, almost in front of the pulpit, and has been occupied by William McKinley, Mrs. McKinley, and envious. It is a noble, heroic life. All the qualities of true greatness are in it.

The supreme unselfishness, the complete consecration, the self-sacrificing devotion which go to make up our idea of the heroic are seen at their best in the missionary life. To turn his back on civilization, to leave home and friends and refinement and settle down among barbarians

SUNDAY SCHOOL CHAMPIONS.

The Roll of Phenomenal Attendance Records Steadily Swelling—Some who have Passed the 1,000 Mark—The Championship Still Undecided.

PERCIVAL GROVER.

OUR Sunday School contest is now the absorbing theme among the young folks everywhere, and among those of larger growth as well, for pastors, teachers and superintendents in the United States and Canada are watching its outcome with eager interest. Another cause of the augmented interest was the definite announcement in last week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of the four valuable prizes—two for male and two for female scholars to be awarded at the close of the contest, and also of a Roll of Honor prize being in readiness for every Sunday School pupil who has made a record of 260 consecutive attendances. The first and second class prizes for male and female scholars are as follows:

FIRST PRIZE—ELEGANT LARGE ART BIBLE (London Edition)—with nearly one thousand superb illustrations, bound in genuine seal—Divinity Circuit—kid lining, red under solid gold edges, with thumb index and appropriately inscribed; Worth $25.00.

SECOND PRIZE—THE SAME BIBLE, bound in Divinity Circuit, Palestine Levant, Grained Leather Lining, Red Under Gold Edges, not indexed, and appropriately inscribed; Worth $18.50.

In addition to the above we shall present: ROLL OF HONOR PRIZES. For this competition all pupils who have made a record of 260 consecutive attendances and upward are eligible. Send name, with name of Sunday School and of superintendent or teacher, and the record of continuous attendance. Every successful competitor so vouched for will be presented with a superb illustrated New Testament, beautifully bound in Divinity Circuit, with red under gold edges.

Every mail brings new names to swell the list of competitors. Some of the letters received are full of interest. Unfortunately there are some applicants whose names cannot be entered in the competition for the reason that all records entered must be up to Feb. 1, 1897. Sunday scholars whose attendance records have permanently stopped some time ago cannot be accepted.

Among other remarkable records is the following from Toledo, Ohio:

I am glad—not boasting or with the spirit of challenge in the least—to be able to break John C. Eastland's record in the case of my daughter Lydia P. Clark. She went to Sabbath School for fifteen years and didn't miss at all. It was a Congregational mission school in this city, from 1876 to 1892 (Mr. Buck, Superintendent). She then took the primary department in a mission school of the M. E. Church, and is still its teacher, having missed in all three times in twenty years last October. I have a younger daughter who has missed a very few times in sixteen years. I couldn't say just how many. MARTHA CLARK.

Another equally remarkable record is brought to light in the following:

255 Rittenhouse Street, Germantown, Pa., Feb. 14—We have a Sunday School in Germantown where there are many boys and girls who have attended ten years without being absent once. There is also a young lady, Miss Jennie Powers, 5,029 Henry Street, who has not missed a Sunday for twenty-one years. She belongs to the West Side Presbyterian Church, and Rev. Porter Lee is the pastor. I think the young lady, as well as other members of this Sunday School have a remarkable record. MRS. MARVIN O. ADAMS.

It is to be hoped that these and all other entries will be properly vouched for by the Sunday School Superintendent or teacher according to the conditions of the competition.

Philadelphia, Pa., Feb. 16—Albert W. Bisbing came to Class 64 of the Fifth Baptist Church Sabbath School, April 23, 1887, and has never missed a session of the school since. He was awarded a retray of the class in 1887. He was married some time after, and for the last five or six years lives about eight miles from the church, but every Sunday afternoon, rain, storm or thaw, he is at his post of duty. I have been informed that he had an unbroken attendance of seven years before he came to Class 64. G. C. LANSBES.

VERMILION, So. Dak., Feb. 18—Rollin E. Haynes is a South Dakota boy who nearly, if not quite, equals John C. Eastland in regular attendance. Since beginning to attend the First Baptist Sunday School of Vermilion, S. Dak., eight and a half years ago, he has only missed two Sundays. Previous to that he had been a very regular attendant at Sunday School ever since he was large enough to go, but no record was kept of his attendance.

MRS. J. A. HAYNES.

Boston, Feb. 8th.—Harlan P. Bradsteel, aged twenty-six, has not been absent from the Sunday School for seventeen years, and has attended 890 consecutive sessions. Rufus Hart, age sixty, has not been absent for sixteen years, and has been present at 838 consecutive sessions. Earnest Bradsteel has not been absent for seven years. They are members of the Maple Street S. S., Danvers, Mass. GEO. W. FISKE, Supt.

The leading competitor in the Girls List is heard from in the letter below:

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 12, 1896. We have a lady in our school who last year completed her twenty-first year of unbroken attendance—Miss Florence Wagner of West Philadelphia. She belongs to the Mantua Baptist Church, Rev. J. G. Walker, D.D., pastor, 645 North Fortieth Street. MRS. T. B. MATTHEWS.

Our readers will remember the famous Sunday School record of the Petters family, given in a previous issue. Another equally remarkable family is found at Fall River, Mass. Mr. H. A. Skinner of that place has kindly placed their record at our Franklin Krupp, a scholar in the Sunday School of the Walnut Street Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, has a record of regular attendance covering a period of more than twelve years without one absence. This Sunday School is in the habit of rewarding perfect attendance for the year by a book given at the Christmas anniversary. Frank has received twelve of these testimonials—a good foundation for a library. He is now about fifteen years of age. His home is ten or twelve squares from the church, but neither the heat of summer, nor the storms of winter have kept him from Sunday School. In the day school Frank has the same record of perfect attendance, with the exception of three days' absence at the time of his father's death. MRS. J. A. B.

Here is still another Philadelphia record-maker:

Philadelphia, Feb. 16—Frederick Eggeling, 738 Brooklyn Street, of the West Hope Presbyterian Church Sunday School, Preston and Aspen Streets, West Philadelphia, has not missed one Sunday for the last nine years. He is now thirteen years old, and for some time attended a Baptist Sunday School, but has been connected with the Presbyterian for three years. MRS. G. W. MARTER, Teacher.

Three magnificent records are given below, one of twenty-two years, which but for a single absence might have placed the candidate ahead of all competitors:

Philadelphia, February 16, 1897.—Misses Grace and Lizzie Cornman have not been absent from Sabbath School in thirteen years and two months, and H. L. Cornman, has been disposal, and it is well worth perusal. They attend the Franklin Hall Sunday School.

Mary E. Slinn, aged 20 years and 5 months, has not been absent in 15 years and 2 Sundays. She has been in her class 782 consecutive Sundays. Lavinia Slinn, aged 17 years, has not been absent for 12 years and 2 Sundays. She has been in her class 626 consecutive Sundays. Joseph R. Slinn, 15 years of age, has not been absent in 11 years and 2 Sundays. He has been in his class 574 consecutive Sundays. George Slinn, 10 years of age, has attended Sunday School for 7 years, but has been absent about seven times through serious sickness. These are the children of Mr and Mrs James Slinn, of 1666 Rodman street. Their record is truly wonderful, and must have depended not only on determination, but good health.

Here is a wonderful record—the pupil being a colored lad.

MORRISVILLE, Pa.—Goldsmith N. Scott, a colored boy from the "Friends' Shelter" in Philadelphia, came, when eleven years old, to live with Dr. W. E. Case, of Morrisville, Pa. From that time, Feb. 10, 1888, to Dec. 1895 (when he entered the Hampton N. & A. I.) he did not miss a single attendance at the Presbyterian Sunday School of that place. He is now nearly twenty years old and goes every Sunday afternoon with two or three other students to teach in a little village Sunday School a few miles out of Hampton, Va.

absent only once from Sabbath School in twenty-two years; and this time it was on account of the death of his grandfather. So far as the records I have seen yet, I think our school deserves a reward for faithful attendance.

Geo. E. Scott,

Brooklyn, N. Y., comes to the front with an interesting group of records in this letter:

ARMENIAN RELIEF WORK

Still in Progress—Anatolia Great Excited Over the Cretan Troubles

ARMENIA'S NATIONAL COAT-OF-ARMS.

[This photograph of the Arms of Armenia is a painting by Hamparsum Papasian of Varna, original of which is in the possession of the C. H. A. at Etchmiadzin. The lamb represents Armenia, the lion and dragon indicate Persian quest, the Crescent and stars, Moslem oppression. Ararat is shown with the ark on the mountain crest. In the centre of the design the figure of a genius of Armenia is seen weeping over the ruins of her desolated cities. The inscription translates, "Armenia's New Salvation and Unity."] struggle for freedom. Meanwhile, although Turkey's troubles seem to increase in every hand, the Sultan does not relax his military terrorism of the people of Anatolia. In the distressed districts, the government aid afforded to those imperiled by the massacres has been nominal, and had it not been for the generosity of friends abroad, whose have been sent through the missions thousands must have died of starvation this winter. This good work goes from week to week with unflinching loyalty. Mail advices, always tardy in key at the best of times, in exciting times like the present are phenomenally slow. The prevalent excitement over the troubles with Greece may possibly count for the unusual delay in receiving letters from points in Asia Minor where the relief work is going on. The following amounts have been received for Armenian Relief during the week:

INDIA'S BITTER CRY!

The Christian Herald Readers' Five Thousand Dollars Cabled Intact to the Missionaries—Some Significant Contributions.

THE gift of five thousand dollars from readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to the starving people of India, has, we are happy to report, reached the field of suffering, intact, without any deduction for expenses. In nearly every instance the cost of cabling the money to the missionaries for distribution was borne by the Missionary Boards whose missionaries we thus helped, and where that arrangement could not be made, the proprietor of this journal has defrayed the expenses out of his own pocket. Thus every dollar contributed by our readers whose gifts Dr. Lipsch felt justified in anticipating, will be spent in food for the hungry, which will be given to them, as our readers and ourselves wish, in the name of our dear Lord. Heathen and Christian alike, will know, when they receive the gifts of people who are utter strangers to them, that they are removed from their life and land, that there are some who reverence the name of Christ and for his sake will gladly feed the hungry. May the Lord who said, "I was hungry and ye fed me; inasmuch as ye did it unto me, ye did it unto me," bless every contributor to the fund!

On this page we print a picture, reproduced from a photograph, which tells its own pathetic story of the urgency of the need. In the original photograph there were still more appalling figures which we are compelled to omit because of their shocking ghastliness. They are members of the group who fell down dead of starvation before the photograph was taken. In almost every village of the famine district such a photograph might be taken. Every village has a contingent of men, women and children who, in the best of times, live on hand to mouth, and who, when the price of grain rises in time of famine, inevitably perish unless aid is extended to them. The aggregate number of them is enormous, probably not less than thirty millions, and they are so scattered that only the missionaries who are among them can reach them. During the past week a native Indian, a Major in the Salvation Army, by name, visited THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office and graphically pictured the suffering of his people. Letters recently received by the Major implore him to make the pressing need known to the Christians of America. The strong and shed bitter tears as he told of men driven to desperation by the cries of their loved children for food, going into the night and cutting poisonous roots of which they make a fatal decoction, and their mother and babes drink it and end their sufferings. Others wander away in the hope of begging a little grain, and die of exhaustion by the roadside leaving their families to perish. Asked why they do not go to the government relief stations, the Major confirmed the reports already received, that in many cases the sufferers are a hundred miles away from such stations and have no means of travel. He so corroborates the statements of the missionaries that for one cent a day a life can be kept alive, so that the gift of a dollar will almost preserve a life until the gathering in of the next harvest.

The terrible famine that is now raging in India, in consequence of which multitudes are perishing for lack of food, says Mrs. Benere, the well-known missionary at Poona, has left hundreds of orphan children homeless and dying in the streets.

In such numbers, in fact, are these children cast upon the streets that it is impossible for the missionaries to care for them all. In a residence in India of eleven years, Mrs. Benere asserts that she has seen no such opportunity for rescue work as now prevails. "The famine is too terrible to describe," she writes. "It is enough for us to know that parents sell their children for food, or push them into wells, that they may not see them suffer."

A correspondent of the Bombay Guardian gives his testimony to the extent of this noble work. He says: "I cannot find language to describe the kindness which, in this time of trial, induces English, Scottish, German, American, and Swedish missionaries to pick up these little waifs and care for them with a generosity beyond their means. They make long journeys, and take them themselves to their houses or their schools, and stint their own necessities to give them milk and clothing." Pandita Ramabai, who is well-known in America, has sixty famine widows (chiefly children), and is preparing to receive many more.

It is very gratifying to notice how many of the Christian organizations of our land have been moved by India's bitter cry to contribute to the relief of the sufferers. Much more might be done in this way if some member of each Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union would bring the the Master in the way of giving; but my heart goes out in pity to the suffering ones, so that I can scarcely enjoy my own food when I think that they are dying for want of bread.

Mrs. L. Flenner, Hollidaysburg, Pa., writes:

I am poor and my husband a laboring man, but we will deny ourselves something so that we can give a little of one dollar a month. I am glad you are willing to send it as we did not know how we could get it to them. The Lord always provides a way when we are willing to give.

Mattie Anderson, Dayton, Iowa, reports: When the pupils of the intermediate room of the school here heard of the starving multitudes in India, they eagerly volunteered to save the pennies they would spend for sweets during the next two weeks and send the money to the missionaries in India for the suffering people. Half the enclosed amount ($2.25), is their contribution, given by loving eager little hearts.
